More Iranian Jews to be arrested: Tehran Times

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Authorities in Iran are planning to arrest more Iranian Jews in connection with alleged spying for Israel and the United States, the daily newspaper Tehran Times reported last weekend.

"In fact, the arrested [13 Jewish] suspects are only executive members... There are others, considered to be the brains of the network, who must be arrested as well," an informed source told the daily.

"Investigations for identifying other suspects are continuing," said the source, speaking from the southern city of Shiraz, where 13 Jews have been arrested and are currently detained.

The first group of Iranian Jews was arrested last March on charges of spying for Israel and the United States. Two Muslims were also arrested in connection with the same charges.

"There are 13 Jews and two Muslims among the suspects, and they have been handed over by the intelligence service to the judiciary," the source said.

The source said that the Jews, along with the two Muslims, are accused of sending information to Israel, sending network members abroad for training and helping Iranians leave the country illegally.

Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi told state-run television in Tehran last week that the arrested Jews have only been charged with espionage so far, and will have a fair trial with lawyers. He added that they are also allowed to meet their family members in prison. He condemned the United States for putting pressure on Iran to release the Jews.

"We will not give in to American pressure regarding the arrested Jews, and we will not allow any interference in our internal affairs. How can the United States tell us what to do with people charged with espionage?" Kharrazi said.

The trial of the 13 was supposed to open last week but was postponed.

Meanwhile, the New York Times carried an Agence France Presse report last Sunday saying Iran was preparing its courts to try the 13 Jews.

People convicted of spying in Iran are usually sentenced to death.

Dagestan Jews fearful

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — After several weeks of bloody clashes with Russian forces, Muslim insurgents in Dagestan have declared they are moving to the next stage in their struggle to impose Islamic rule in the area – the fight against "Zionist" domination.

In a statement posted on the Islamic rebels' Web site, insurgent leader Shamil Basaev announced that his men would purge Dagestan of leaders influenced by Zionists and by Russian President Boris Yeltsin, who is a "faithful servant of Zionist capital," the Moscow Times reported.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Gift From Family

OTTAWA — The local Community Capital Campaign has received a $250,000 gift from Abe and Sol Carlofsky in memory of their parents and sisters. The brothers will endow about 1,200 square feet of space set aside for day care within the new Bess and Moe Greenberg Family Hillel Lodge.

ISRAEL

Committee Criticized

JERUSALEM — Coalition and opposition legislators in Israel are demanding that Prime Minister Ehud Barak alter the makeup of a newly appointed committee on the drafting of yeshiva students into the army. The critics claim the body, which has a majority of observant members, would simply grant army exemptions to the students.

German Sentenced

JERUSALEM — A German convicted in an Israeli court of helping the militant Islamic group Hezbollah was sentenced to 10 years in prison. The mother of Stephan Smyrek, 27, who travelled to Israel for the verdict, burst into tears after hearing the sentence last month, and said her son would appeal.

Funding For Hamas

JERUSALEM — Iranian intelligence transferred some $5 million to Hamas to fund terrorist attacks on Israeli targets, according to England's Sunday Telegraph. The money, reportedly paid into the accounts of Hamas officials in Jordan in late July, was the first in a series of monthly payments being made in return for terrorist activities against Israel.

WORLD

27 Jews Die In Quake

ANKARA — Two vacationing Jews from Istanbul and 25 Israeli tourists were killed in last month's devastating earthquake in Turkey, according to the World Jewish Congress.

Revenge Attacks

NEW YORK — An incident in which swastikas were etched on seven German-made cars in Brooklyn late last month is being seen as a retaliatory hate crime for recent anti-Semitic attacks. Police have no suspects in the vandalism.

Paper Lauds Shootings

LOS ANGELES — A Jewish group called on the Egyptian and U.S. governments to condemn an article in an Egyptian newspaper that applauded the recent attack at a Los Angeles Jewish centre in which five Jews were injured. The Simon Wiesenthal Centre issued the call in reaction to an article in the Ahbar Elyum newspaper that asked for God's help in supporting white supremacist Buford Furrow's goal to "annihilate the Jewish race in the U.S."

Portugal Accusations

NEW YORK — Portugal took in Nazi gold worth about $1 billion in today's currency, according to the World Jewish Congress. The accusation came as a conflict over Portugal's involvement in Nazi gold escalates in the wake of a report released by the government, saying the country had no reason to compensate victims from the Nazi era.

Universities Among Top 50

NEW YORK — Two Jewish universities rank among the top 50 in the United States, according to a new survey. Brandeis University was ranked 31st and Yeshiva University 44th in U.S. News and World Report's annual report of American universities.

Was Rabbi Favored?

NEW YORK — The U.S. Attorney's Office is investigating whether New York parole officials gave favorable treatment to a rabbi after pressure from a Jewish fundraiser for New York Gov. George Pataki's campaign, according to the New York Times. Prosecutors are investigating whether a parole official facilitated the release of Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans on kidnapping charges because of "improper political pressure" from Rabbi Leon Perlmutter.

Aussies Sue School

SYDNEY — An Australian family is suing a Jewish day school, claiming that its policies toward children whose mothers have undergone Reform conversions are discriminatory. The Western Australia Equal Opportunities Tribunal is expected to rule in the next two months on whether the Carmel School discriminated when it decided in 1996 that Gregory Goldberg would be ineligible for financial aid, to lead services or to read from the Torah if he enrolled there.

School Board Reverses Star of David Stance

WASHINGTON — A Jewish high school student has won a standoff with Mississippi school officials over his right to display a Star of David symbol in class.

The Harrison County School Board voted unanimously last week to exempt religious symbols from its policy that prohibits students from wearing anything that could be construed as a gang symbol.

School officials had barred 15-year-old Ryan Green from wearing the Star of David symbol, saying it could jeopardize his safety.

Some gang insignias incorporate six-pointed stars.

The original decision prompted an outcry from religious leaders around the country and a threatened lawsuit from Green's family and the American Civil Liberties Union.

"We realized that it infringed on freedom of religious expression, and that freedom supersedes the safety issues," Randy Williams, the board's president, said in explaining the reversal.

Jewish leaders hailed the move as an important victory for religious freedom, one they hope will send a signal to other school districts around the United States that do not show enough sensitivity to the rights of religious minorities.

UIA Federations Canada

Finkelstein: 'We're trying to do more with less'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The creation of UIA Federations Canada last year represents a more holistic approach to the needs of the Jewish community nation-wide, according to the organization's executive director, Maxyne Finkelstein.

In June 1998, the Council of Jewish Federations Canada (the Canadian arm of the Council of Jewish Federations, which dealt with national and local Canadian concerns) and United Israel Appeal Canada (the conduit for UJA funds earmarked for overseas) merged into one organization.

"Effectively, what it meant," said Finkelstein, "was that the two organizations that were interacting with the federations nationally, came together as one.

"I think it was reflective of the growing feeling that we as Canadian Jews don't necessarily separate our interests."

Maxyne Finkelstein

Steve Ain

David Goldstein

The merged organization – which has only one less staff person than the original two together – is more reflective of the way communities actually operate, she explained.

As an example, she mentioned the issue of building leadership in a community. Instead of dealing with Canadian Jewish needs and global Jewish needs as separate agendas, the new agency makes it easier to look at the whole picture, Finkelstein said.

Among its mandates are helping communities raise more money, determining how to increase the amount allocated for overseas Jewry, representing Canadian Jewry through community federations and assisting communities that don't operate within a federated structure.

In the latter case, the umbrella organization is involved in fundraising, as well as facilitating connections to organizations offering the likes of chaplaincy, Jewish education and Israel experience programs.

In the past five years, the situation has "changed tremendously" in Jewish communities, Finkelstein said.

In light of government cutbacks, "there is a growing realization that the needs of the elderly and the poor will be with us for a long time." She also cited a growing understanding of and commitment to providing Jewish education to as many children as possible.

"We're trying to do more with less," said Finkelstein. The organization's budget comes mostly from the proceeds of campaigns of federated communities.

UIA Federations' operating costs represent "about half the percent of what most federations spend," she noted.

A native of Montreal and a longtime Jewish community professional, Finkelstein was executive director of the Jewish Federation of Montreal before moving here July 1.

Next June she will take over the helm of UIA Federations Canada on the topic of:

THE REAL MEANING OF KOL NIDRE

Sunday, September 5, 7:30 p.m.,
Beth Habonim - 5 Glen Park Avenue
(1 block north of Bathurst & Glencairn)

Rabbi Gelfand's presentation will be preceded by short stories on the themes of Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur, moderated by Alec Gelcer.

Rabbi Shoshana Gelfand, a graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary, is a member of the Rabbinical Assembly Committee on Jewish Law and Standards and is a frequent scholar at conferences such as CAJE, the National Jewish Choral Festival, HUC's Kollel, and Camp Ramah. She currently serves on the boards of The Institute for Contemporary Midrash and Project Kesher (an organization which teaches Judaism to women in the Former Soviet Union).

From the editor's desk

Distinctly Canadian Jews

As this horrible and historic century draws to its close, we note with special irony that the fastest growing Jewish community outside of Israel, is that of Germany.

The second fastest growing Jewish community outside of Israel, however, is that of Canada.

More Jews now live in Canada, some 350,000, than in Great Britain, a reversal of the Jewish demographics of merely one generation ago. Larger Diaspora communities exist in the United States, the former Soviet Union and France. But, in none of these communities is the number growing.

Most of us know very little about the unique history and characteristics of our own community. In fact, very few of us even regard it as unique; rather, we often see ourselves as a smaller facsimile or replication of the American Jewish community. But the Jewish community of Canada is indeed distinct from its American counterpart.

Now for the first time at any university in the world there is a permanently endowed academic chair that will generate scholarly research and study concerning the Jewish community here.

Last year, the J. Richard Shiff Chair for the Study of Canadian Jewry was established at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies. Its first chairholder is Prof. Irving Abella.

Abella is one of Canada's most distinguished historians. He is also one of the Jewish community's most committed lay leaders and activists. Among his many scholarly writings, the one for which he will likely be most remembered, is None is Too Many, the watershed book he co-authored with Harold Troper that chronicled Canada's shameful, racist Nazi-era immigration policy towards the Jews.

I also proudly point out that Abella is a member of The CJN's editorial advisory board.

Last week, across my desk, I received a copy of the text of the inaugural lecture that Abella delivered last year as the Shiff chairholder.

It was a broad, informative panorama of the history of the Jews in Canada and a thoughtful conjecture regarding our future.

At the very outset of the lecture, Abella carefully and incisively establishes that there are differences between the Canadian and American Jewish communities, tying communal differences to the differences between the two countries, contrasting historical, constitutional, societal and geographic contexts.

"The American Jewish experience is a different one, not a better one. It is time to put to rest the canard that Canadian Jews are in a time-lag, that we are a generation behind American Jews. We are not. We have developed differently because of our Canadian context, because of our history, our constitutional structure and our political system, because of the influence of French Canada and because of the enveloping British-Protestant culture outside of Quebec, because of the relatively small size of the Canadian Jewish community and finally because of metropolitanism. Until recently, most of Canada's Jews lived in three urban centres, and today about half live within commuting distance of the Jewish Community Centre in the northern part of Toronto."

According to Abella, the distinct governing and constitutional ethos in Canada has profoundly influenced the development of the Jewish community here. "Not surprisingly," he wrote, "in Canada there has evolved a Jewish community that is more traditional, more unified, closer to the old country, and more culturally homogeneous than in the United States. While American Jews were joyfully entering into the mainstream of the great republic, Canadian Jews could easily maintain their Jewishness in a country that had no coherent self-definition and whose mainstream was for so long closed to Jews."

But even as Abella traced the details of Canadian Jewry's uniqueness and the reasons for that uniqueness, he also confirmed that "the burgeoning assimilation rates in the United States are a growing concern to Canadian Jews" as well. He then boldly posed the essential challenge in the coming years to the community: "[T]o demonstrate that Judaism and Jewishness can succeed and flourish in a free, democratic, pluralistic Diaspora environment."

Abella concluded with a measure of guarded optimism: "The task facing Canadian Jewry is formidable. But, as our history has shown, Canadian Jews are a formidable people." MBD

Worldwide day of tfillot and Tehillim for agunot

Special prayers set for erev Rosh Hashanah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The first worldwide tfillah and Tehillim day for agunot, organized by L'mann B'Nos Yisrael International, and supported by the chief rabbis of Israel, is planned for erev Rosh Hashanah.

A Get Day will follow on Sept. 14, says Mattie Klein, founder of the volunteer-run, New York-based organization. "This is the first time ever that there will be worldwide focus on the problem of agunot."

Jews from all over the world, said a news release from the organization, "are urged to join together in beseeching God for mercy for agunot, their children and their neshamot, who are prevented from being born as a direct result of the tragic agunah crisis.

"We are challenged to encourage recalcitrant husbands to do tshuvah and give their agunah wives a get before Yom Kippur."

Batei din will be prepared in various locations in Canada, United States and Israel to facilitate the get process, and L'mann B'nos Yisrael will cover the cost of the sofer (scribe).

In Israel, said Klein in an interview from New York, women often get together on Fridays and pray at holy sites throughout the country. "I decided to ask the rabbis to make one Friday worldwide tfillah and Tehillim day, and erev Rosh Hashanah was chosen."

She found women in Israel, she said, who helped print and distribute more than 100,000 fliers containing the prayer by Rabbi Mordechai Tendler (printed with this article), and the fliers were placed at various holy sites.

Newspapers have also printed the prayer, which can be said on the Get Day as well.

"A lot of agunot pray with tremendous intensity. Their devotion is incredible. We have to hear those prayers. Around the world, we are asking that people stand in solidarity, voluntarily join us in this effort and say tfillah and Tehillim, wherever and whenever they can."

The event is also supported by the Union of Orthodox Congregations of America, the Rabbinical Council of America, National Council of Young Israel, Emunah and AMIT.

Sephardi community honors Hassan's memory

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Since the death of Morocco's King Hassan II in late July, his son and successor, King Mohammed VI, has assured two American Jewish delegations that that he is going to follow in his father's footsteps.

This was one of the messages Israeli journalist Samuel Segev stressed at an event last week honoring Hassan's memory one month after his death.

An audience of 400 gathered at Petach Tikva-Anshe Castilla Congregation to pay their respects to the late king, who played a key role in Middle East peace efforts.

Also on the program were Abdelkader Lecheeb, ambassador for the Kingdom of Morocco; Simon Keslassy, liaison with the Moroccan Embassy and vice-president of the Rassemblement mondial du Judaïsme marocain (World Gathering of Moroccan Jews); Rabbi Yoseph Osiel, spiritual leader of the congregation; and Carlos Laredo, president of the congregation.

Segev took the opportunity to clarify Hassan II's consistent history as a Middle East moderate.

The late king was known for the role he played in bringing together Israel and Egypt in 1977, immediately preceding then Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat's famed visit to Israel.

Hassan II was not an opportunist who wanted to play a certain role at that moment in history, emphasized Segev.

In the late 1950s, when Segev first met him, the then crown prince told the journalist there was "no question" that Israelis would be allowed to attend an upcoming conference in Casablanca. He extended a personal invitation to Segev, a sixth-generation Israeli whose ancestors emigrated from Morocco in 1840.

As Segev recalls, Hassan said, "It never crossed my mind that people of goodwill who want to negotiate peace would not be allowed to visit an Arab country."

The late king's concern for all his subjects, including Jews – allowing them freedom of movement and granting them equal rights – goes back to his youth, said Segev.

But Hassan II's greatest passion, according to Segev, was fostering peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

At a 1965 Arab summit, Hassan "proved to be the most clever and the most realistic" of all the Arab heads of state, said Segev. Hassan urged the others to negotiate with Israel instead of waging war.

He also encouraged Americans to invest in Morocco, benefitting his country's economy. His legacy, according to Segev, was a more educated, prosperous and benevolent country.

Rabbi Osiel, who left Morocco as a young child, offered prayers for the soul of the late king and a benediction for the new king.

He also expressed his feeling of personal connection to the monarch and read a message from Rabbi Amram Assayag of the Sephardic Kehila Centre. The latter was unable to attend due to a previous out-of-town commitment.

Rabbi Assayag noted that the king permitted Moroccan Jewry to practice Judaism "without restraint" and recalled meeting the king at a New York reception.

After standing in line to kiss the king's hand, as is the Moroccan custom, Rabbi Assayag was astonished when the king cut him short, in a warm and respectful manner, asking the rabbi instead to pray for him every day.

Very few countries can claim such honorable conduct toward Jews and other minorities, said Petach Tikva president Laredo. Morocco offered safe refuge, he noted, referring to Jews who fled there during the Inquisition.

He praised the late king as a skillful diplomat and shrewd politician who promoted tolerance and peace.

Keslassy, speaking in French, also praised Hassan II for his wisdom and tolerance and expressed allegiance to the new king.

Moroccan Ambassador Lecheeb, in a white djellabah, red fez and yellow pointed slippers, conveyed Mohammed VI's "feelings of affection and esteem" and appreciation for the support shown to him by the Jewish community.

"Being a state deeply rooted in history, Morocco has always taken much pride in its rich and diversified heritage, of which Moroccan Judaism is part and parcel," Lecheeb said.

Among Hassan II's accomplishments detailed by Lecheeb was the "vivid testimony that peaceful coexistence between Jews and Muslims is not only possible, but an actual reality in Morocco."

Wye and wherefore

People interested in the successful resolution of the peace process in the Middle East have repeatedly been told not to expect quick results. The method of negotiations in the Middle East, on all manner of issues, diplomatic or commercial, we have always been told, resembles only marginally, the method of negotiations in the west.

Even as these words were being written on the weekend, we witnessed, up close, the frustrating manifestations of those negotiations.

Barely hours ago, on Sunday afternoon, reports from the area were upbeat that the two sides had all but ironed out their final differences and would sign a memorandum in Egypt this week on Thursday outlining the timetable for implementing the outstanding Wye commitments.

But as of the early morning hours on Monday, there was a reversal of mood. Negotiations hit the proverbial snag. Prime Minister Ehud Barak felt compelled to issue an ultimatum to the Palestinians giving them only "a few hours" to provide "satisfactory answers" on the outstanding issues. Failing those satisfactory answers, Barak said he would carry out the Wye accords "by the letter" which, in his view, does not serve the best interests of either side.

The press reported that two issues remained unresolved: the linkage of the remaining Wye withdrawals to the final status talks, and the number and type of prisoners to be released. If these indeed were the outstanding issues, progress in the talks had not only stalled but had actually regressed. For, heading into the weekend, the media had reported that the linkage issue had been resolved, and that the single issue left to be settled dealt with prisoner release.

Last week, the shape of the emerging Wye implementation agreement was reported in the media. The Israeli daily Ma'ariv suggested there were four main points to the agreement:

- A framework for a final status agreement was to be in place by Jan. 15;
- The last Wye redeployment was to be completed by Jan. 15;
- Israel would free around 300 Palestinian prisoners; and
- Key economic matters were finalized concerning the development of a Gaza seaport and the opening of two safe passages from Gaza to the West Bank.

Apparently the most contentious issue remained prisoner release. The Palestinians were said to be demanding the release of about 650 "political" prisoners. Israel steadfastly refuses to give up anyone who belongs to Hamas or Islamic Jihad.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat appears to have decided "to play" to the radical Palestinian crowd, at least for the time being, preferring to curry favor with them, rather than to bridge an impasse with the Israelis.

This is not how to build trust with the still new Israeli government. As we have often written in the past, without that trust, there will be no mutually respectful bilateral relationship. And without such a bilateral relationship, there will be no real peace.

The signing ceremony in Egypt this week may yet take place, but the bazaar negotiations of Yasser Arafat placed it in doubt.

Jewish middle class squeezed by day school fees

Paul Lungen's article, "the Squeeze on the Jewish Middle Class," (CJN, Aug. 12) correctly identifies the need to pay private day school tuition as the overwhelming source of the high cost of Jewish living. The importance of Jewish education for maintaining Jewish continuity is a matter of consensus across the entire spectrum of the Jewish community.

The article also correctly identifies the underlying source of the problem, which is a provincial government's school funding policy that explicitly discriminates against non-Catholic religious minorities. Many people do not realize how isolated Ontario is in Canada and the world in maintaining this kind of explicit religious discrimination.

To complete the picture, we need to consider solutions to end the discrimination. Unfortunately, many people assume that the "Adler" Supreme Court case ended the fight. In fact, the majority of the judges stated that extension of public funding to schools of other denominations does not infringe on the Catholic's education rights or any other constitutional provision. Establishing equity for all denominations is a matter of political will, plain and simple.

Jewish Parents for Equity in Education Funding (JPEEF), a newly constituted grass-roots organization of Jewish parents, is taking a leadership position in addressing the issue, working together with other community organizations. Our worst enemies are apathy and pessimism. There has never been a better chance to right this historical injustice. Jewish parents, grandparents, and supporters of day schools must speak up loudly that politically sanctioned religious discrimination will not be tolerated. Volunteers are urgently needed to help with political action, communications, fundraising, liaison with schools and shuls, and special events. Gold is not all that glitters at Maccabi games

It was with considerable dismay that we read the article (CJN, Aug. 12), summarizing Canada's "failures" at the Pan American Maccabi Games held in Mexico City this past July.

As parents of a junior baseball team member and supporters of Canada's representatives to the Games, we felt extraordinary pride and positive emotion at watching our Canadian athletes at various competitions.

The emphasis to our Jewish athletes at these games was on participation and the coming together of Jews from around the world in this unique experience, not on winning or losing. As one of our parents indicated in toasting the junior baseball team at a dinner in their honor on the eve of the gold medal game, the gold that they would be taking home lay in the friendships made with Jewish athletes from around the world and not in the color of their medal. Your article missed the point of the experience and emphasized the wrong values.

Disagrees with treatment of Premier Harris

Why the rather vituperative and hostile description of Mike Harris' performance at the recent provincial premiers' conference? (CJN, Aug. 19) For a Jewish communal paper that usually exercises restraint in matters of opinion to the point of timidity, your bias with regard to the premier of Ontario is baffling.

For the second time in a row, the Ontario Progressive Conservatives were awarded the mandate to govern, thus satisfying the demands of legitimacy. It is true that they did not receive the majority of the popular vote, but then which recent Ontario government did? Even in the "Jewish" ridings the PCs' message was effective, and as a result, impressive support was in evidence.

Why do you then describe Premier Harris as a "cowboy... with his guns blazing... discharging a hail of income tax bullets... whose bruising offer was... turned down by all other leaders"?

Why do you assume that all your readers would of necessity share your obvious disdain for this government and its leader? You have often written about the Israeli political culture and its inherent incivility. Let's be fair and show respect for our elected leaders even when we didn't vote for them.

Shooting of Jewish children stirs disbelief

On Aug. 10 I witnessed a group of children having to be escorted out from another killing zone. Hand in hand they walked, as I watched in disbelief wondering what sort of human being could leisurely gun down little children like paper targets at a shooting gallery.

There is no question that in order to do away with these frequent violent expressions, society must concentrate on destroying anything that provides the opportunity for this evil to flourish. We have to demolish the fertile grounds from which these seeds of hatred are permitted to germinate. For as long as this is not done, then these kinds of situations will continue to be regular events on the nightly news and headlines in the daily newspapers.

Israel measures up in Human Development Index

By AMNON RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

How can a society measure its wealth? The usual index is the gross national product (GNP) per capita. But the fastidious prefer the more sophisticated version of this index: GNP per capita, adjusted to the buying power of the national currency in the country being studied.

This index, however, has its limitations. For one thing, it does not take into account the factors influencing the residents of the country in question.

For example, the GNP can continue to climb because of economic activity that has no social value. To illustrate, if a country builds another 10 prisons and the number of employed prison guards increases by several thousand, its GNP will rise, but its quality of life will not be very impressive.

What does the term "GNP per capita" mean anyway? Small children and adults are very different in terms of their consumer behavior. In Israel, which is a relatively young nation, children make up 34 percent of the total population, as opposed to 26 and 19 percent in the United States and Germany, respectively. Thus, the picture created by the GNP per capita is always much darker than the true situation in the field.

Giving tzedakah is part of Israel street life.

Additionally, the GNP per capita does not measure how wealth is distributed in a particular country. What benefit does the majority of the population derive from the country's wealth if it is concentrated in the hands of a small group of powerful capitalists? The per capita income is part of that nation's statistics, but not part of the revenue of the vast majority of its households.

For these reasons, the United Nations established a new way of measuring human development that could measure development, not just in the economic sphere, but in other areas as well. The first report issued in the context of this special program introduced the world to the Human Development Index (HDI), which takes into account the health and level of schooling of the citizens of a country.

The latest report, the 10th to appear so far, has some fascinating figures that should prove of interest to many Israelis. It should come as no surprise, for instance, that, among the 174 countries surveyed, Israel is in the top 54, that is, those countries with the highest level of human development. To be precise, we are on the 32nd rung of the ladder, ahead of Hong Kong, Cyprus, Greece, Portugal and South Korea and, of course, way ahead of all the countries in eastern Europe, South America and the Arab world.

Amnon Rubinstein

Our rating is higher on the HDI ladder than it is on the GNP per capita one for a number of interesting reasons, all of which are flattering to our national psyche.

First of all, Israelis have one of the longest life expectancies in the world, 75.7 years for men and 79.7 for women; in this category, we are ahead of affluent America and right behind Canada, Norway and Japan, the three heavyweight champions in longevity.

Second, in the area of infant mortality, Israel has achieved incredible success: For every 1,000 live births in Israel, there are only six mortalities among children aged five and under, as opposed to eight for the United States, seven for Canada – the most developed nation according to the HDI yardstick – and seven in England, which has an extensive health services network. In the area of infant mortality in general, without any age limitation, Israel occupies a very high place in the standings – ahead of the United States, in fact.

The number of mothers who die in the delivery room in Israel is seven per thousand, as opposed to 15 in France and 12 in the United States. Quite a feat for a pluralistic country like ours, where most of the population, Jew and Arab alike, were born to parents who grew up under conditions of poverty and illiteracy.

In light of these reasons, Israel, which places 62nd in the GNP per capita index (adjusted to reflect buying power), occupies the 32nd spot in the HDI standings, an achievement that all Israelis can be proud of. There are many areas in which Israel has a unique status. The skyrocketing growth of our population outstrips the population growth rate of any of the world's affluent nations, which registered an average of 2.4 percent between 1975 and 1997. Only a few countries, such as Saudi Arabia, Oman, Jordan and Paraguay, had higher rates.

What do these figures tell us? First, Israel's attainments are truly remarkable, especially if we take into account the enormous defence budget we are saddled with: over eight percent of our GNP. Second, GNP output cannot accurately express these attainments.

Nonetheless, because of the way Israelis think and act and because Israel is in competition with the world's richest states, we cannot allow ourselves to be content with the number 32 spot in the HDI rankings. We must reach for a much higher rung through accelerated economic growth, primarily through an increase in our labor force, but also through continued upgradings of our health and education systems, which are the real factors determining the level of a society's well-being.

Opinions

The Svend Robinson controversy

Svend Robinson, MP, wants the words "supremacy of God" removed from the Canadian Constitution. He believes their presence represents a disregard of a large minority. He has in mind those who do not believe in God, but want to be citizens on the same level as everyone else. Even though with "God" included, the Constitution does not exclude non-believers, Robinson thinks the clause is discriminatory.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Readers will remember that NDP leader, Alexa McDonough, punished Robinson for putting his proposal forward, and relegated him to the backbenches. Although they have since made up, the controversy deserves a comment.

It is in the nature of the issue that a quick yes or no is not appropriate. Let it be clear that we are dealing with Canadian constitutional questions, while in a Jewish context the answer would likely be different.

Removing something from a document and undoing what has been done previously is not the same as introducing it in the first place. When Pierre Elliott Trudeau introduced the Constitution with its special inclusion that our nation stands "under the supremacy of God," no one asked what he meant, and people took it to be a means of giving the document additional authority. It was much like "In God we trust" on every American coin.

The Canadian controversy is the reverse of the discussion over a potential Israeli Constitution. Members of the Orthodox parties are firmly set against such a state document because they believe that by its very presence, it will restrict the supreme authority of Torah and Halachah, and disregard – if not deny – the supremacy of God. The opponents of a constitution want Torah to reign supreme, and therefore nothing should be introduced that would limit this supremacy.

But the Robinson proposal is different. The inclusion of the word God in the Constitution's preamble does not constitute an obligation to believe, nor does anyone's denial of God constitute an infraction of the Constitution. Canadian humanist organizations are as legal as the most religious institutions.

The Canadian preamble that Robinson would like to remove is, in essence, a symbolic statement that our Constitution recognizes certain values and freedoms as incontestable, as spelled out in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is such basic and immovable privileges that the document wants to ensure, by creating a framework that protects all who live in Canada.

Robinson, whose ideas I have on occasion found to be disagreeable, had a right to promote a revision. Even though we live, constitutionally speaking, under the supremacy of God, Robinson is free to disagree. McDonough's decision to demote him was a purely political move, because she feared that the NDP would be identified with Robinson's non-theistic opinions. She would have been wise to say nothing, for his proposal had as much likelihood of succeeding as a motion to abolish the Constitution itself. The "supremacy of God" is here to stay. Robinson had the right to say what he did and we have a right to disagree. It is as simple as that.

The gender factor

The appointment of two women to Ehud Barak's cabinet did little to assuage the anger of Israeli feminists. They continued to fume over his broken promise to have significant female representation in the government, but had little public impact in their protest. Ultimately, the Israeli public is accustomed to a male-dominated government, and public support was virtually non-existent for the feminist position.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

The reaction may also have been influenced by the response to the chief advocate for the feminist cause. Yael Dayan, one of the most senior Labor parliamentarians, led the charge, and argued for her own inclusion in the cabinet. She was overlooked twice by Barak – first, in the formal stages of forming a government, and second, when he enlarged the government to include four additional ministers.

Dayan, who is direct, outspoken and unpredictable, personalized the issue immediately. In fact, Barak's decision to leave her out was a shrewd political calculation. In his cabinet appointments, he refrained as much as possible from choosing individuals who were likely to challenge him.

He knew that Dayan, for one, would easily vote against him when she disagreed. Her appointment would also have been interpreted as support for her strident positions on the peace issue, and against the religious parties. At this point in the life of his government, Barak has no desire to alienate his religious coalition partners unnecessarily.

The two women who were appointed to the cabinet come from different backgrounds and political routes. Both of them represent a younger generation of women in politics, and neither of them is closely identified with the "women's agenda."

Dalia Itzik, minister of environment, has been a central figure in Jerusalem politics for years. She served as a Labor representative on the municipal council, and got onto the Labor national ticket as a regional representative. She was close to Shimon Peres for many years, and her declaration of support for Barak in the Labor leadership race was crucial in giving him a needed political base in Jerusalem.

She has served as chair of the Knesset education committee, and while Benjamin Netanyahu was in power, headed the Labor party's response team. Itzik is articulate and forceful in her media appearances, and as a result, is a popular guest on Israel's innumerable talk shows. She has not emerged as a thoughtful or creative politician, but rather is considered a competent parliamentary fighter.

Yuli Tamir, minister of absorption, was Barak's personal appointment to the cabinet. Tamir, the only minister who does not hold a Knesset seat, hails from Jerusalem's left-wing "aristocracy" and academe.

She was a founder of Peace Now, and her appointment marks a final step in the mainstreaming of that movement. Indeed, like her colleague, MK Dedi Zuker, her political pronouncements over the last few years have moved closer to the current centre of the Israeli political map.

Until recently, Tamir was married to one of Barak's close comrades from his days as commander of the IDF elite commando unit. An accomplished academic in the field of political theory, and chair of the Association of Civil Rights, she became involved in party politics after the Rabin assassination. While she chose education as her policy area of interest, her telegenic qualities made her, too, a popular media guest.

Tamir gained a realistic seat in the internal party primaries, but was pushed down the list to make room for assured seats for regional and sectoral representatives. Her appointment to the cabinet was Barak's gesture of compensation for that loss.

Barak has never declared himself a feminist, and in his usual manner, dismissed the criticism from women's organizations as irrelevant and trivial compared to the tasks at hand for his cabinet.

Tamir and Itzik are unlikely to become vocal spokespersons for women's issues, and the non-partisan women's caucus in the Knesset will continue to be the focal point of debate on such matters.

This time around, the Knesset has the largest number of women in its history. Of the 15, one is the first Arab woman MK ever elected. As the women in the Knesset are younger, and as political parties have declined in influence, women MKs have found it easier to come together on issues such as family violence, sexual assault and social policies affecting women and children.

Israel still lags behind North America in the normative response to domestic violence and crime, and an active lobby on these matters is a necessary precondition for continued change. However, the recent episode around women's representation in the cabinet simply proved that in order to succeed, women will require other, powerful political allies on their side.

Stock-taking on the High Holidays

The period of the High Holy Days is one where Jews step back and review the events of the previous year. While individuals should each review their private lives, we can all ponder the communal ledger. Although a year is a short time in the life of the Jewish people, we can at times see new trends emerging.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

On the negative side, anti-Semitism has alarmed Jews in North America, even if the aggregate statistics on anti-Semitic acts and hate crimes – like violent crimes in general – have not increased. The woundings at the Jewish Community Centre in Los Angeles, the fires set in synagogues in Sacramento, and the attacks on Orthodox Jews earlier in Chicago, have had sobering effects.

Jews should realize that there are probably dozens of armed and nutty anti-Semites spread through the United States who could also commit similar violent actions. In Canada there has recently been a cemetery desecration in Winnipeg and an assault on two elderly Jews in Toronto.

These dangerous misfits are associated with racist groups such as the Aryan Nations or other neo-Nazi or fringe pseudo-Christian hate groups. These thugs, and their groups, pose no threat to the fundamental position of Jews. They are the most marginal of the marginal. But such acts sow panic and insecurity. Vigilance is always required, even when times are good.

But these acts also have other effects. The various events in California have led to an outpouring of sympathy from Christian churches and the general public. For Jews, it is likely that these events may have strengthened their Jewish identity, even among the less affiliated. But we do not know for sure.

On the clearly positive side, the ongoing concern for Jewish continuity – the threat of assimilation – is now merged with talk of a Jewish "renaissance." A new birthright program is being established (Charles Bronfman has played a key role) which will send thousands of teens for an educational trip to Israel, at little or no cost.

The evidence seems clear that these trips can have an overwhelmingly positive impact on the participants. But the effect is not uniform or easy to predict.

I recently evaluated one such program in the United States. The students all raved about the trip, its high quality, the stimulation, the bonds that were formed among the participants. (These were students of non-Orthodox and non-day schools backgrounds.) But when asked to specify the nature of the impact on their thinking about Israel, most stressed how the trip brought home to them the "problems" facing Israel, particularly the tensions between the Orthodox and the non-Orthodox.

This was crystallized in one Shabbat service they attended. The women were forced to stand behind a mechitzah, at the back of the synagogue, while the men sang, danced and celebrated in the main area in the front.

The religious tensions in Israel are a real fact of life, likely to put off some of the teens and young adults visiting from North America. But assuming these new programs will be targeting the non-day school and non-Orthodox population, the attachments to Israel which they produce may be more complex or tenuous than some planners realize.

There are other indications of Jewish cultural strength. Surely the growth of the Ashkenaz festival in Toronto and the Klez camp in Montreal indicate a resilience which was not there 10 or 20 years ago. There are reports of the proliferation of various formal and informal options for adult Jewish studies.

Celebrities like the comedian Roseanne Barr or the writers Christopher Hitchens and Tom Stoppard are rediscovering their Jewish roots in public – though some aspects of this Jewish chic are distasteful.

What this means is that while assimilation and mixed marriage remain serious challenges, they are not the total picture. And as explosive acts of anti-Semitism garner headlines, we must never lose sight of how anti-Semitism here differs from anti-Semitism in the Old Country. There the state and state agencies were the instruments of oppression, supported eagerly by the mass of population. Not here.

To all readers, a wish for a shanah tovah u'metukah for this coming year 5760, for Jews as individuals and for the community as a whole.

The Kirshner File

Hitler still remains much of an enigma

Adolf Hitler has been probed and prodded by a litany of "explainers" – historians, political scientists, sociologists and psychoanalysts – and, yet paradoxically, he remains an enigma.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As one of his eminent biographers, Allan Bullock, has remarked, "The more I learn about Hitler, the harder I find (him) to explain."

Fifty-four years after he blew his brains out in a besieged Berlin bunker, Hitler still defies explanation in a key number of areas: What is the origin of his anti-Semitism? Was he, in fact, of partial Jewish descent himself? When did he decide to exterminate European Jewry? What was his precise role in the Holocaust?

Ron Rosenbaum, the author of Explaining Hitler (HarperCollins), suggests that these conundrums may never be solved. Too many crucial witnesses have died without having given testimony, too many key documents have been destroyed, too many memories have faded, and too many gaps in the "evidentiary record" will never be filled, he writes in this fascinating, nuanced book.

When Rosenbaum, a 52-year-old American journalist, began investigating the matter more than a decade ago, he was surprised, if not shocked, at how little agreement there was among academics concerning Hitler. "I had assumed," he said in an interview, "that these basic questions had been resolved."

In his quest for truths, Rosenbaum travelled to Germany, Austria, Britain and Israel. He sought the erudition and wisdom of historians, philosophers and theologians such as Yehuda Bauer, Hugh Trevor-Roper, Emil Fackenheim, George Steiner and Daniel Goldhagen.

In Mein Kampf, his turgid political testament, Hitler traces his antagonism to Jews to a brief encounter with an Orthodox Jew in Vienna – "an apparition in a black caftan and black earlocks." Rosenbaum, however, dismisses this claim.

He also gives short shrift to a theory propagated by Hans Frank, the governor-general of occupied Poland. Hitler, it goes, was enraged by the pathological fear that his family's bloodline had been "poisoned" by an Austrian Jew named Frankenberger, who had impregnated his paternal grandmother, Maria Schicklgruber.

"It's a seductive but unfounded and unproven theory," said Rosenbaum, noting that researchers have found absolutely no trace of Frankenberger. He believes that Frank invented this myth so as to blame the Holocaust on Jews.

Rosenbaum, too, rejects the hypothesis that the roots of Hitler's anti-Semitism are entangled in the supposed malpractice of a Jewish doctor, Eduard Bloch, who attended to his dying mother when he was 18. "It's one more story where the blame is shifted to Jews," he said.

Rosenbaum maintains that Henry Ford, the automobile manufacturer, played a much more decisive role in nurturing Hitler's anti-Semitism than is generally known. "He cribbed Ford's theory of an international Jewish conspiracy and of the place of Jews in history. Hitler learned from Ford."

As to when Hitler decided on the destruction of Jews as his political goal, Rosenbaum is impressed by the late Lucy Dawidowicz's book, The War Against the Jews, which he describes as a "dazzling performance." The idea, she believes, arose in his consciousness in 1918, after World War I, and took shape in 1924, the year Mein Kampf was published.

Like Dawidowicz, Rosenbaum subscribes to the view that Hitler, rather than responding to circumstances, had always intended to murder the Jews of Europe. "This was his overriding mission," said Rosenbaum.

He fully embraces Milton Himmelfarb's "No Hitler No Holocaust" dictum. Rosenbaum, therefore, is an "intentionalist" rather than a "functionalist" (someone who thinks that Hitler was driven to the Holocaust by events.)

"The Holocaust was Hitler's highest priority," said Rosenbaum, whose book has been translated into several languages, including German and Hebrew. "I do believe that the decision to murder Jews on a systematic basis was Hitler's."

Ron Rosenbaum

So absorbed was he by his self-appointed task that, in 1944, when German armies were being trounced on the eastern front and the spectre of defeat loomed large, he ordered military trains to be rerouted to death camps in Poland.

Asked if Hitler was normal, Rosenbaum replied, "It's threatening and frightening to think of him as one of us," he observed. "But the baby picture of Hitler on the cover of my book suggests that he was indeed normal." Rosenbaum finds it instructive that foreign publishers eliminated that photograph from the dust-jacket.

At the end of the day, Rosenbaum cannot rationally explain Hitler's murderous attitude toward Jews. "I wish I had the answer for that," he said. "I'm not satisfied with the conventional explanations. It's a continuing mystery, and that's why I wrote the book. I'm not the one who'll come up with the ultimate answer. I simply wanted to clarify the debate."

In this respect, Rosenbaum has succeeded.

Magisterial biography

Ian Kershaw's biography of Adolf Hitler, Hitler (Allen Lane/The Penguin Press), the first of two projected books, is one of the finest of the genre. Kershaw, a British academic, has digested the material and presented it in a magisterial style.

Naturally, he explores the antecedents of Hitler's virulent anti-Semitism. Vienna, he speculates, was crucial to his development as a raving racist. Vienna's anti-Jewish gutter press left an indelible impression, as did the legacy of its former mayor, Karl Lueger, who popularized hatred against Jews.

Hitler appears to have voiced no notable anti-Semitic views as a soldier, and indeed, a Jewish officer, Hugo Gutmann, nominated him for the Iron Cross, First Class. But while hospitalized for a severe injury, he came to the conclusion that Marxism and Jews were Germany's worst enemies. Kershaw is uncertain why Hitler turned into a manic anti-Semite.

Hitler's first recorded written statement about Jews can be traced to 1919, when he was caught up in the trauma of absorbing Germany's surrender in World War I. The basic element of his race-based anti-Semitism was plainly evident in a letter to a friend. Hitler espoused a Manichaean view of history as a racial struggle, in which the highest racial entity, the Aryan, was being undermined and destroyed by the lowest, the parasitic Jew.

"The racial question," he noted, "gives the key not only to world history but to all human culture." The mission of the German people was to eradicate Bolshevism, and with it "our mortal enemy: the Jew." By 1924, Kershaw observes, Marxism and Jews were synonymous in Hitler's mind.

Quite persuasively, Kershaw posits the theory that, without World War I, Hitler would not have been possible. "Without the experience of war, the humiliation of defeat, and the upheaval of revolution the failed artist and social dropout would not have discovered what to do with his life..."

In a chilling aside, Kershaw ruminates that Hitler's seduction of Germany showed how a modern, advanced, cultured society can so rapidly sink into barbarity and rapaciousness, culminating in genocide.

Read and weep.

Rabbinic Reflections

Improving our lives

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

There is a very interesting statement found in the Talmud that declares "a person who sleeps seven nights without dreaming is considered a sinner."

This is a profound message which is applicable to the whole year, but especially during the High Holy Days.

This statement calls upon every Jew, at least once a week, to direct their thoughts and actions towards making a better world for themselves, their family, and society at large.

While we may be happy with our lifestyle, there is always room for improvement in our lives. As we approach the High Holy Days we realize the importance of this.

We come to the synagogue to pray and express our hopes for those goals that will enrich our own lives and contribute to the community. We may also pray that many of our dreams become exciting realities in the coming year and years ahead.

More than ever, the synagogue today serves as an inspiring bridge to greater commitment to Jewish life and values in and out of the home.

Our dreams or aspirations should include strengthening our commitments to those values that have ensured survival of Jewish life in the past and are necessary to maintain in the 21st century as well.

In addition to participating in the various activities of the synagogue, make Jewish education and study of the Torah an ongoing pattern for yourself and your family.

Parents and grandparents should be role models so that Jewish education and Torah study does not stop at bar/bat mitzvah but is a lifelong pursuit.

If children see their parents and grandparents continually involved and attending adult education programs then they will take their own Hebrew school studies much more seriously.

The synagogue today, which represents the Holy Temple, is called a miniature sanctuary — Bait Mikdosh M'at. Likewise, the home is called by that name.

On Yom Kippur the High Priest would enter the Holiest of Holies and pray for himself, his family and all of Israel.

Thus, our dreams and prayers should begin with ourselves and our families. At the same time, we must be more involved in Jewish community life here and continue to support our beloved State of Israel.

Let us hope that our prayers and dreams for peace and harmony in our own life, our families and all of Israel will find fulfilment in the coming year.

My family join me in wishing you a healthy, happy and peaceful New Year.

Finding music on the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at some great places to read about Klezmer on line.

This week, how to sample some of the world's best music right at your computer.

The finest online assortment of Klezmer music that I have come across is at the Ashkenaz site [http://www.ashkenaz.org/sounds.html. There are lengthy excerpts from Ashkenaz '97 including the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, the Israeli quartet Esta, Holland's Salomon Klezmorim, Boston's Naftule's Dream and much more.

In addition, there is a selection from lectures on klezmer music and Yiddish culture with topics such as Gypsies, Greeks and Klezmer Music and Adventures in Yiddish, "a lighthearted, absolutely accurate look at the weirdest language around."

(If this whets your appetite for more and you're in the Toronto area, you can visit Ashkenaz '99 on right now at Harbourfront [http://www.ashkenaz.org/].)

One of most famous klezmer CDs is Itzhak Perlman's Live in the Fiddler's House, which he recorded with some of the best groups around like Brave Old World, the Klezmatics and the Klezmer Conservatory Band. You can listen to Perlman play four of his songs at the Fiddler's House Web site [http://www.tara.com/kzype20d.htm]. And you can hear 20 minutes of the lively fiddling of Steve Greenman on line [http://www.klezmershack.com/demos/980822.greenfidl.ram]. Steve has played with several bands in Cleveland and New York.

The Israeli-Jewish-Yiddish-Hebrew-Folk-Cultural Music Midi Free Library [http://members.aol.com/israelmidi/index.html#FOLK] doesn't specialize in klezmer, but you can find a few Yiddish tunes there like Freilich and Im Zer Kotzim Koev. Also, listen to excerpts from the Brookline, Mass., radio show, The Yiddish Voice [http://www.yv.org].

If you prefer to watch some klezmer masters in the comfort of your home then rent the video A Tickle in the Heart (1996) [http://us.imdb.com/Title?0117907]. The documentary profiles the veteran klezmer performers Julie, Willie and Max Epstein. Just when the 80-something brothers tried to retire in Florida, klezmer music enjoyed a resurgence and the Epstein brothers were stars again. The Montreal Gazette called Tickle "one part musical history, one part Seinfeld, and totally enthralling."

Less known is another documentary, The Last Klezmer: Leopold Kozlowski (1995) [http://us.imdb.com/TUris?COM+0113610]. It follows the gifted Jewish musician on a journey through the Yiddish musical traditions of eastern Europe. Kozlowski is a Holocaust survivor who still lives in Poland. The San Francisco Chronicle called the film as "soulful and elegiac as it is sweetly humorous."

A Jumpin' Time in the Garden of Eden (1988) [http://www.jclla.org/videoh.htm] also looks at the early greats of Klezmer music, but then focuses on its resurgence with such bands as the Klezmer Conservatory Band and Kapelye.

Zemerl is a relatively new site that not only has a great selection of songs but also includes lyrics so that you can sing along [http://www.princeton.edu/zemerl/]. You can read up (and listen to) Mekhuteneste Mayne, which tells the story "half-joking and half-begging of a mother who is giving away a bride who wants her daughter to be treated well in the in-laws' home."

And if you know the lyrics to A Yuhr Noch Mein Chasene or Lomir Shpiln a Liebe, the folks at Zemerl want to hear from you.

Klezmer music is never boring and neither are the names of Klezmer groups. I leave you with some of my favorite names: there's Yiddishe Cup [http://www.well.com/user/ari/klez/bands/ycup/klez/ycup.klez.html], the Jews Brothers [http://www.jewsbrothers.com/], the Klez Dispensers [http://www.princeton.edu/~klez/] and, of course, Tennessee Schmaltz [http://techno-info.com/tennesseeschmaltz/].

Moses' last lesson

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the Torah readings approach the last part of the book of Deuteronomy, we become aware that Moses is nearing his last hours.

One of the great challenges in Judaism is to understand the Divine decree that Moses will not enter the land of Israel. After enduring so much, Moses will not be allowed to set foot in the land.

Alone with God on an unknown mountaintop Moses will slip away from humanity. The Torah portrays these last moments somberly but the midrash portrays a universe that rages against this particular death.

According to midrashic passages, each angel has its own response to the approaching death of Moses. Gabriel and Michael plead with God not to have them witness the death of this great man.

Sammael, the wicked angel, anxiously awaits the moment he can take Moses' soul but when he attempts to do so, he is unable to perform this task. After two attempts, Moses finally chases Sammael away using his staff and the power of his learning.

Metatron, an angel close to God, is seen comforting God on the impending loss of Moses.

As the moment of death approaches, God commands Moses' soul to depart from his body and the soul cries out that she does not want to leave.

Moses had already turned to the heaven and the earth, the seas and all of nature to help him plead his case but they all admit their inability to effect any change.

In the end, of course, the decree has been sealed. Moses dies attended by God and the universe is diminished by the loss of this person.

As the High Holy Days are upon us and we approach Yom Kippur Moses teaches us his last lesson. Once again he is our leader and once again this most humble of men has shown us with his actions what the Jewish response should be.

On Yom Kippur our fates our sealed and although we are partners in our destinies, we are not the masters of our ultimate fates.

Perhaps the 'holy' response would be to hand our fates over to God and silently accept whatever decree is ordained.

However, we deprive our bodies during Yom Kippur and thereby emulate angels so we may beg and plead as did Gabriel and Michael.

We acknowledge our spirituality so that our souls themselves will not want to leave us.

Moses has shown us that we do not go silently into that great night but we build our best case to present before God and finally ask for chesed – one more year, although we know we may not deserve it.

As all Jews stand and sing out Avinu Malkainu together we create the thunder of prayer as we declare we will not go with a whimper.

It is one time we all stand together with no disagreements and acknowledge that God's first gift to us is still the most precious: the breath of life.

We learn all this from Moses' last moments and just as the universe was diminished with his passing, so is it diminished with the loss of any person.

May all our thunderous prayers be answered with an equally resounding pronouncement from Heaven: Chayim – Life.

Gemar Tov to everyone.

An Ojibway in shul

Guest Voices

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

A couple of Shabbatot ago, I stood before the congregation at Beth David Synagogue together with Ken Syrette, a native Canadian. It was a historical morning.

Sometime in June, Rabbi Philip Scheim, the rabbi at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, invited me to his shul on a Shabbat morning to be a guest speaker.

I quickly agreed to do so, however with one request. I asked the rabbi if I could have an Ojibway man join me as a co-speaker, my partner in Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless Program.

His name is Ken Syrette, I told the rabbi, and he is a professional from Na Me Res (Native Men's Residence).

The rabbi agreed. He seemed as excited as I was that Ken, or Wind as he is known amongst his people, would speak to his congregation.

The Shabbat I was to speak arrived and I entered Beth David during the reading of the Torah.

I was seated by an usher and waited patiently for Ken to arrive. I was anxious and curious about how the congregation would respond to this tall, stocky man when he entered the sanctuary in his native garb and long flowing ponytail.

Ken arrived as the reading was almost complete. He looked around at the crowd and the stained glass windows. The synagogue environment was so different from his native home in the north.

Ken joined me and we were led up to the front row of the synagogue and seated close to the cantor. I felt both incredibly proud and truly conspicuous on that day.

There were three aufrufs that morning, and the grooms and brides were blessed by the rabbi. The cantor then entered into a stirring rendition of the prayer to close the ark.

The rabbi ascended the pulpit and introduced me to the congregation. I took the podium and asked Ken to join me. For me, the drama was about to begin.

We had made it. In a synagogue, not far from Bathurst Street, on a Shabbat morning, there we stood. An Ojibway and a Jew.

Many years before this, I had thought how great it would be to bring together a Canadian Jew and a native Canadian on a Shabbat morning. It seemed natural. It seemed right. We were landsmen. We share a country. We each understand the pain of exclusion.

I was exploding with excitement. This was the fulfilment of a dream. That is how I felt.

For the next 20 minutes, the brides, the grooms, the rabbi, the chazzan and the 200 congregants listened to Ken and me speak.

I challenged them to roll up their sleeves and dirty their hands for tikkun olam – repairing the world.

I spoke about the need to stop memorializing the Holocaust, and instead live up to our commitment of eternal vigilance of others' agonies and torments.

Ken is an artist. He has a daughter. The congregation was silent and respectful as Ken spoke stoically and brilliantly about his personal trek to overcome his alcoholism, to do something great, to help the homeless.

He spoke about the three Jewish homeless at Na Me Res. Jewish homeless. In a native shelter.

At the end, after Ken's unassuming and unexpected thank you, he and I took our seats once again in the front row.

Some of the shul's more effusive members approached us with big smiles and wished us yasher koach, well done.

My leg was excitedly shaking back and forth – as is my way.

Ken sat quietly and listened to the chazzan as he began a cantorial version of the Mourner's Prayer. I looked at Rabbi Scheim as the congregation set about reading the silent prayer. I felt the whole thing was magnificent.

Later, following the Kiddush and Ken's introduction to marinated herring, we walked out of the shul into a sunny and beautiful day.

One of Beth David's congregants approached me and asked me if she could get involved with Ve'ahavta. I said "sure" and handed her my card. The world seemed somewhat more together.

I realized that a couple of hundred Jews in Toronto, and an Ojibway man had just made a little bit of history. Well done to all of us!

Seymour Epstein takes the reins as BJE's director

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Epi's back.

Seymour Epstein, guru of many of Toronto's Jewish youth in the heady days of spiritual searching in the 1960s, has recently taken up the reins as director of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and vice-president for Jewish Education and vice-president of UJA Federation.

The Toronto-born Epstein, 53, has earned degrees from the Jewish Theological Seminary, Columbia and Brandeis universities, and the University of Toronto, where he got his doctorate in education.

In Canada, he worked at United Synagogue Day School where he helped found an experimental high school, he directed the Jewish Teacher Training Program at McGill University, and he was also very involved in Camp Ramah.

In 1981, he moved to Casablanca, Morocco, to become educational consultant for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). Based in Israel, he continued working for JDC in western Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Wanting to spend less time travelling, and more time with his family – his wife Cheryl and their children Yoni, 16, and Sarit 14 – he was pleased when the BJE position became available, he said.

He wanted to be a part of a community with the strong commitment to Jewish education that Toronto has, he said. "In terms of organization, it is the most positively oriented community, and has been for a long time."

Saying he has tremendous respect for classroom teachers, he said that one of his main goals is to "find a format where the best teachers can shine."

Teachers, he said, can help in such aspects of education as curriculum, teaching techniques, the life of the school, and problem and special children.

While the details have not been worked out, Epstein said that he wants to create a "teacher incentive program," where teachers, perhaps for a stipend, will have the opportunity to be creative and innovative. For instance, they might work on bolstering tzedakah or the importance of ecology, he suggested.

Seymour Epstein

People must recognize the importance of the supplementary school, he said. "Look at the total picture. Many Jews are less committed, and have opted for supplementary schools. A large group are peripheral [to the rest of the Jewish community] and get no education at all, but might be tempted to attend a supplementary school."

These programs, Epstein said, must be made more effective and efficient. "Don't complain that they only run for two hours. What counts is what you do for those two hours."

There must be more "sensitivity and sensibility" about special education, Epstein said, noting that a report on the subject commissioned by the BJE is expected out in about six months.

Epstein said he sees a gap between "the services offered and the services required," for both learning disabled and gifted children.

"The philosophical issue here," he said, "is the general obligation of the school to teach the child as he or she is. Every child has strengths and weaknesses, and needs specific help. Special education is getting very special help to one child."

There must be more planning and organization, as well as more of an effort to encourage the government to fund needed services, Epstein said.

CHAT building wheelchair accessible

The job of the BJE, he said, is to facilitate and encourage all the agencies involved with special needs, such as Jewish Vocational Services and special and regular schools.

"People don't notice the little things," he mused. For instance, the renovated CHAT building will be wheelchair accessible. "It's a small but important thing that encourages the attitude that every child is entitled to a Jewish education."

Education is not just what goes on in a classroom, Epstein said. Informal experiences like attending camp are major factors in forming a Jewish identity. As well, he said, adult education for different stages in life – from the young family to the elderly – should be encouraged.

Epstein said he feels "comfortable" among Jews of all denominations. "Even though I have a highly developed personal spiritual life, it hasn't stopped me from having a deep respect for other Jews – especially those comfortable in their own ideology, be it Conservative, Orthodox or Reform."

He said, "self righteousness and complacency are our worst enemies. We must encourage respect between all of us."

Epstein sees himself as "more of a team leader than a solo act. We have to respect [other people's] patterns of work and ideology."

CJN Internet goes daily with new section

TORONTO — The Canadian Jewish News has gone daily – The CJN Internet that is.

When The CJN Internet was launched in February 1998 it was decided that it would mirror the major sections of the weekly print edition and it would only be updated on a weekly basis, with the exception of a ticker tape-like headline that would change daily.

At that time, CJN general manager Gary Laforet said that it would remain "a work in progress."

And so it has.

Since its launch, a food section and letters to the editor section have been added, while parenting has been merged with the health section.

However, until a week ago, the Internet edition remained a weekly.

On Aug. 24, an international section which will be updated on a daily basis was added.

"News by its very nature is current events," said CJN Internet editor Jeff Rosen. "The Israeli election and the recent shootings in Los Angeles have shown us the importance of keeping our site up to date with the latest news events.

"Our international section will allow us to do so, offering news updates and breaking international news.

"It will also feature analyses, backgrounders and opinion pieces by leading journalists, educators and scholars," Rosen added.

So, sit back and set your browsers to www.cjnews.com.

UJA Federation Launch Sold Out

jewish toronto

Using sights, sounds and a roomful of enthusiasm, UJA Federation excited the senses for a sold-out crowd of over 1,200 guests at Monday's kickoff of Campaign 2000. But in the end it was the evening's emotional impact that will be most remembered. From the first video image, to the final musical presentation from Israeli singer, Marina Faingold, the event returned again and again to the theme of how UJA Federation funding changes Jewish lives around the world.

"Changing lives is what UJA Federation and this campaign are all about," declared David Engel, who, with Mel Wolfond, is co-chairing the campaign. "We're rescuing Jews facing growing anti-Semitism in the former Soviet Union, providing shelter and safety for abused women and children right here in Toronto and helping members of our community connect more closely with Jewish life," said Wolfond.

This theme was first introduced during the showing of Wings of a Butterfly, a campaign video by Emmy award-winning filmmaker, Simcha Jacobovici, which illustrated how individuals can transform individual lives and the world as well.

One of the guest speakers, Sigal Hobbey, an Ethiopian immigrant now living in Israel, provided a practical example of the video's primary message. Her aliyah was funded by the UJA Federation-supported Jewish Agency, which is "bringing home" over 3,000 Quara Jews from one of Ethiopia's most remote regions. The emotional pull took an intellectual turn with the appearance of CNN White House correspondent, Wolf Blitzer.

The Launch was chaired by Ronald Appleby and Fran Sonshine.

Campaign 2000 is year two of UJA Federation's drive to raise $50 million annually by 2001. Last year's record total of $40.5 million was four million more than the year before and campaign officials are counting on the same pace of growth for this year and next.

"We have our work cut out for us," said Women's Campaign Chair, Carole Sterling, "but I know the community will answer the call and make this the most successful UJA Federation campaign ever."

A "Dream" for the Future

By Elaine Fogel

UJA Federation has left a marked impact on the life of 19-year-old Tamar Pichkhadve. With worldwide UJA Federation funds, she and others from the former Soviet Union (FSU) have immigrated to Israel as part of a Jewish Agency program called CHALOM, which translates as "dream" in Hebrew.

When Tamar was 10, civil war erupted in Tbilise, the capital of Georgia, where she was born. There was limited electricity, and in some places, no water or bread. "Everything was falling apart," she remembers. Schools and universities were closed. Children lay dying in hospitals. Life was extremely difficult.

Although the Georgian Jewish community had enjoyed relative religious freedom for over 2,500 years, a rarity in the FSU, anti-Semitism erupted during this period. Bandits broke into their house while her brother and grandmother were alone. "The robbers knew we were Jewish, so they wanted gold and money," Tamar recalls. When her brother and grandmother explained that they had none, the thieves threatened to kill them, disbelieving that Jews could be without wealth.

"They put an iron to my grandmother's head while she screamed for help," Tamar recounts. They returned to kidnap her brother, smashing him on the head with a gun. A week later, the family decided to send Tamar's brother to Israel for his safety.

Tamar remained in Tbilise until she was 17, finishing school with honours. One day, she received a phone call about the CHALOM program from a Jewish Agency emissary and made aliyah in 1997. She now works as a receptionist in a Dead Sea hotel .

The CHALOM program accepts 2,000 students from the former Soviet Union each year. At a cost of $7,000 (U.S.) annually per person, and so many young people applying, the program cannot meet financial demands. CHALOM is one of many Jewish Agency projects, funded by the worldwide UJA Federation network, on behalf of young people in the FSU.

Shul's music director honored after 50 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

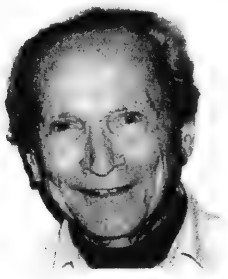
TORONTO — Gordon Kushner loves music. That fact, and his health, he said recently, account for his longevity as Beth Tzedec Congregation's director of music and choir conductor.

Not to mention that he had "no ambition," he joked in a recent interview.

At 83, he still enjoys his work – and still teaches the occasional student. His 50-year association with the congregation dates back to Goel Tzedec, which merged with Beth Hamidrash Hagadol in 1952 to form Beth Tzedec.

Kushner's work at the synagogue, however, represents only one aspect of his music career.

On Sept. 25, the first day of Sukkot, he will be honored at Beth Tzedec during services. As part of the tribute, several of Kushner's original compositions and musical arrangements will be performed.



Gordon Kushner

He will also be presented with a bound collection of his synagogue compositions.

"I don't call myself a composer," Kushner told The CJN. His liturgical music is "quite traditional," he said. "I try to tailor part of it so congregants can chime in if they want to."

Kushner's familiarity with traditional liturgy dates back to his early childhood in Winnipeg, where his father Nachman was a Hebrew teacher and cantor at the "Mishnayes" congregation, which no longer exists.

Gordon's mother, Sossie, used to sew dresses for his piano teacher to pay for his lessons.

Both parents discouraged him from becoming a "klezmer," someone who plays in a club.

He studied accountancy for a while, but gave it up when he was unable to find an apprenticeship. "In those days, there was one Jewish chartered accountant in Winnipeg," he recalled.

He never stopped playing piano, and his avocation eventually led him to the CBC, where he first performed on live radio (then the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Corporation) in 1936.

After serving in the Royal Canadian Navy during World War II, Kushner moved to Toronto to study at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

His first year here, in 1946, he met his wife, Thelma, after a Jewish music concert. He proposed on their second date.

Now the parents of two and grandparents of three, they celebrated their 52nd anniversary in June.

"We have differences of opinion – and most of the time, she's right," Kushner chuckled. "She's a very sparky lady."

At the CBC, Kushner worked as a radio and television announcer, soloist, conductor, arranger, composer and orchestral pianist as well as a producer of several musical shows.

He taught theory, composition and piano at the University of Toronto's faculty of music from the early 1960s until 1972 and was with the Royal Conservatory of Music from 1972 until 1991 (ultimately as principal), having been asked back twice after retiring.

He was also involved in early childhood music education through the Kodaly system.

In the 1950s, he accompanied singer Evelyn Pasen (now Dorfman) for a fill-in show she did following General Electric Playhouse on CBC television.

She knew she "could always rely" on Kushner despite the uncertainty of not knowing from one week to the next how much time would be allotted for her show.

Now a member of the Beth Tzedec choir, Dorfman says of Kushner, "He's a fine musician and a nice person."

"I can hardly believe he's a man in his 80s," said Faye Kellerstein, also a choir member. "He's just so with it. He hears every little nuance and every little flaw...but he's also a mentsch. He doesn't lose his temper easily. It's fun to work with him."

Like his father, Kushner has enjoyed getting to know his students. "How do you get the students interested? That's the important thing," he said.

Nachman Kushner had "great musical instincts," said Gordon. "His tastes were serious classical music."

Kushner himself enjoys most types of music, he said.

Just the day before, he had bought a Cleo Laine CD of pop tunes, on impulse, while shopping for cheese at a local food store.

"I just listened to it this morning," he said. "I'm very happy I got it. She's an incredible singer, never sings out of tune."

Israeli Scout Friendship Caravan delights kids

By NICOLE SALAMA
Student Intern

TORONTO — The themes of international friendship and brotherhood exploded at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) last month, when the Israeli Scout Friendship Caravan came to town.

The Israeli scouts put on their 121st performance for roughly 400 children at the BJC's Centre Camp. The five boys and five girls gave an enthusiastic show filled with singing, dancing and Israeli education.

The 16- and 17-year-olds performed songs in English and in Hebrew. The style of music varied from Fiddler on the Roof to modern tunes. The performers engaged the crowd and encouraged the children to dance with them on stage.

Earlier in the week, the Caravan performed at Shalom Village, a home for the elderly in Hamilton, and at Mel Lastman Square in Toronto.

This year is the Caravan's 25th anniversary, and the teenagers have been travelling across North America since June. As well, the Caravan is heading to Brazil for a week after leaving Canada.

Two members of the Caravan, Omer Gil and Orit Stern took a few minutes out of their hectic schedules to speak with The CJN.

Both 17, Gil and Stern said they feel this is "a once in a lifetime experience" and that their time in each city is "too short."

Becoming part of the Caravan involves three stages of tests and four months of rehearsals and preparation, they said.

It's a lot of work but it's worth it to "see we affect people," said Gil.

Robert Engel, the national chair of the Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting and Guiding in Canada said scouting in Canada differs from the experience in Israel. Both focus on "international brotherhood" but "singing and dancing is a part of scouting in Israel," while in Canada, they are not emphasized as much.

YOU MAKE A LIVING BY WHAT YOU EARN. YOU MAKE A LIFE BY WHAT YOU GIVE.

UJA FEDERATION

No one gift changes more lives.

The Way Ahead

With your support

Campaign 2000 will take another large leap toward our $50 million objective. So many people are still counting on us. Jews who struggle for food and shelter. Jews who are abused. Elderly Jews leading lonely and isolated lives. Jews seeking stronger ties to Jewish life. And Jews in the former Soviet Union facing daily onslaughts of anti-Semitism. Together, here's what we can do with increased Campaign 2000 contributions:

- Augment subsidies for the poor and enlarge job placement programs for Jews receiving government assistance
- Enhance palliative care for the dying and counseling for their families
- Offer an opportunity for more teenagers to participate in the March of the Living
- Increase support programs for Holocaust survivors
- Finance emigration and absorption for an additional 10,000 Russian Jews escaping a rising tide of anti-Semitism
- Enable Jewish students from war-torn Yugoslavia to continue their studies in Israel and prepare for aliyah

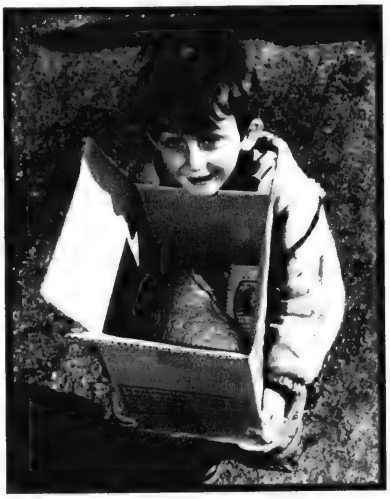
A Sacred Trust

Campaign 2000, the second year of our Campaign for Fifty, symbolizes a commitment to each other strengthened by successive centuries. A sacred trust. Decade after decade, we have never faltered in our support for fellow Jews. Now, as we cross into a new century, this historic obligation remains. It belongs to each and every one of us. It is our eternal responsibility.

UJA FEDERATION

No one gift changes more lives.



Campaign 2000

Heading for Fifty

Last year, UJA Federation launched a bold initiative to raise $50 million annually by 2001 to assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity, and rescue Jews in danger. Thanks to your remarkable generosity we're off to an outstanding start. We raised $40.5 million - over four million more than the year before. Now, buoyed by your support, we've expanded existing programs and initiated new ones, as we Head for Fifty. Here's just a small sampling of what we've accomplished together through last year's additional donations:

- We increased our allocation to Jewish Family & Child Service by over $550,000 to assist, among others, the Jewish poor; abused women and children witnessing violence.
- We allocated substantial funding for life-saving hunger relief on behalf of desperately poor, elderly Jews in the former Soviet Union.
- We helped make it possible for an expected 60,000 Jews this year to find freedom in Israel from anti-Semitism and economic instability in the former Soviet Union.
- We extended additional support to Zareinu , which provides high quality Jewish education to challenged children.
- We initiated family education programs for children and their parents to learn together about the beauty of Judaism.
- We wrote a new chapter in Jewish history by helping to bring Jews home to Israel from Ethiopia's remote Quara region.

Compensation for Palestinian refugees explored by experts

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Some of the world's leading experts gathered in Ottawa recently to explore one of the world's thorniest problems: compensation for Palestinian refugees.

The two-day informal gathering, which was closed to the media, was the third in a series of conferences and dialogues in the so-called "Ottawa Process," which has been examining a comprehensive solution to the problem for nearly two years.

The process is an outgrowth of the Refugee Working Group, which Canada has chaired since 1992.

According to the workshop's final report, which is posted on the Internet, 26 participants and several guest speakers and observers mulled over academic studies on the subject, which has proved among the most sensitive issues in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. That's because it has traditionally involved stratospheric amounts of money, and raised the spectre of the Palestinians' so-called right of return to their former homes.

Conference participants discussed who should get compensation, how it should be paid, and who should administer the process.

Israel was represented by Shlomo Gazit and Mark Heller, both of Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies. Gazit, a former head of Israeli military intelligence, is the author of a 1995 study that caused a stir, because it argued that the solution to the refugee problem was the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and a kind of "Law of Return" for diaspora Palestinians.

Israel has always categorically ruled out the right of Palestinians to return to their pre-1948 or pre-1967 homes because the resultant influx of millions of Arabs would seriously upset the population balance – perhaps threaten the Jewish majority – and thus spell the end of the Zionist dream.

But since bilateral and multilateral peace talks began in 1991, Israel has become more receptive to the notion of compensation for Palestinians who lay claim to pre-state property or who have suffered as a result of being uprooted.

There was general agreement at the conference that states bear responsibility for their actions, and that refugees (both Palestinians and Jews) have a right to restitution or compensation.

However, the workshop heard that international law is not well developed in the area of compensation for Palestinians, who have been officially stateless and were not nationals of any country at the time their losses took place.

Over the decades, there has been wide disagreement on how many Palestinian refugees there are in the world. The United Nations puts the number at 3.5 million (including those displaced by the 1967 Six Day War). Israel estimates the total amount is around two million, while Palestinians have said the number is closer to five million.

Following the 1948 War of Independence, some 700,000 Palestinians became refugees.

However, there was broad agreement in Ottawa that while the payment of compensation recognizes that property seizures took place, it does not mean an admission of responsibility. That principle, delegates heard, might help to make compensation more politically palatable in Israel.

"If Israelis are assured that the final status agreement will resolve the refugee issue, and if there is both a defined amount due and a defined end to the process, they are more likely to support it.

"On the other hand, any fear of a continuing and open-ended process of refugee claims would make Israel much less willing to accept or contribute," the report says.

Today, Israel is offering collective compensation for refugees – an unspecified lump sum to be paid into a general fund for their rehabilitation.

But the Ottawa conference underlined just how far apart the two sides are when it comes to the crux: how much money is involved. Various and wide-ranging estimates were put forward.

For example, in 1951, the UN estimated Arab property losses in the 1948 war at 120 million Palestinian pounds.

Those figures spiralled upward in the ensuing years and today, Palestinian researchers translate material losses into the range of $235 billion (U.S.), adjusted for inflation, interest and currency fluctuations.

That amount, they stress, would be increased (some say doubled) if psychological damages were factored in Previous proposals from Arab experts suggested $20,000 per refugee.

Israel's Gazit suggested that $7-$10 billion in total is feasible.

The international community has thus far pledged around $7 billion over 10 years to support the peace process through aid to the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and has actually delivered about $500 million a year.

While some participants held out the hope that "substantially" more funds would be secured from international donors to finance the refugee component of final status talks, "most of those with experience in the foreign aid sector warned that this was unlikely to be the case."

No specific references were made to the 450,000 Jews who fled Arab countries in 1948. Many lost all their property, for which Israel demands reciprocal compensation.

The workshop was held under the aegis of the Palestinian Refugee ResearchNet, which is maintained by the Inter-University Consortium for Arab Studies in Montreal, and the International Development Research Centre, a federal government department that assists developing countries.

Jewish Defence League to open Montreal office

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal-born Jewish Defence League (JDL) national chair, Irv Rubin, said he will open an office of the militant group here this fall to defend Jews from, what he sees as, the threat to their security posed by the nationalism of sovereigntists.

The chapter will be launched in "mid- to late September, or the first of October, at the latest," he said in a telephone interview from Los Angeles, which is where the JDL is headquartered. He said he will be in Montreal for the launch.

Jewish community officials, however, were skeptical. Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Quebec chair, Dorothy Zalcman Howard, charged that Rubin is "capitalizing on recent events at the Jewish Community Centre in LA to promote his organization and objectives." CJC said it is strongly opposed to the JDL's "vigilantism."

Rubin said he has several candidates for the position of director, and is trying to make up his mind which to select.

"I have to choose the right person. They have to be articulate, they have to be knowledgeable about Jewish history, especially in that town, and they have to be dedicated. This is a 24-hour-a-day job, or at least it is in the United States," Rubin said.

Rubin has been talking about a Montreal chapter since the 1995 referendum. That effort intensified in 1996 when Le Soleil columnist, Michel Vastel, created a controversy over remarks he made that referred to Jews killing Christ.

In the midst of the debate over whether the name of the Lionel Groulx metro station should be changed in light of the nationalist leader's anti-Semitic views, Vastel said, in effect, on a radio talk show that he was fed up with Quebecers being asked to renounce Groulx and that the Jews, after all, were not being asked to apologize for killing Christ.

Rubin said they failed at that time. The fact that the JDL was then "rebuffed by CJC and the establishment" did not help.

Rubin, 54, said he first experienced anti-Semitism in Montreal, before the family moved to LA in 1961.

He recalled signs on hotels warning "No dogs or Jews allowed," and that "French-Canadian schoolchildren taunted him because he was Jewish."

Rubin believes "Jew hatred" is still a problem here. "If my fears about separation finally come true, and I believe they will, even Sephardi Jews will not feel so comfortable among the French," he said.

He described a JDL presence in Montreal as an "insurance program" to safeguard the Jewish community.

Rubin said he realizes there are a "lot of naysayers" who insist anti-Semitism is not an issue in Quebec, but he said that is not what he is hearing from his own sources.

Asked who they were, he mentioned Dan Nimrod, who publishes a newsletter on Jewish affairs, from an arguably right-wing perspective.

Besides combating anti-Semitism, Rubin said the JDL has a role to play among Jews themselves, fighting assimilation and "self-hatred."

For many years, the JDL's Canadian office was located in Toronto and run by Meir Halevi. Rubin, a former U.S. air force sergeant, has headed the JDL since its founder, the late Meir Kahane, went to Israel, where he founded the extreme right-wing party, Kach.

New counsellor at embassy

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Amir Maimon arrived in Canada at the end of July to assume the position of counsellor at the Israeli Embassy.

He takes the place of Chen Ivri, who returned to Israel at the conclusion of his posting.

With only three days together, Maimon and Ivri began their round of introductions, travelling to Toronto and Montreal to meet representatives of national Jewish organizations, including the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada.

Maimon is now paying courtesy calls to his colleagues in the diplomatic communities, members of Parliament and representatives of various government agencies.

"Personal contacts are, I believe, one of the most important aspects of my profession and it takes time to establish good relations with people," he says.

Prior to joining the Foreign Ministry, Maimon had a distinguished career in the Israeli Army, where he achieved the rank of Lieutenant Colonel by the age of 28.

Maimon's foreign service career began with a posting to Ethiopia as second secretary at the embassy in Addis Ababa.

"Three months after our arrival in 1991, we were celebrating Purim with the Ethiopians at the embassy compound, when we received information that the rebels in the north had resumed the war and managed to capture the city of Gondor," says Maimon.

"I was the co-ordinator between the various organizations that were involved and the authorities in Ethiopia. My role was to make sure the plan to evacuate the Jews was accomplished."

His assignment as co-ordinator of what was known as Operation Solomon led to an award for his efforts in evacuating the Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

Maimon has also served in London and Ankara and spent two years as director of the Diplomatic Cadet Course in Israel.

Upon their arrival in Ottawa, Maimon and his family immediately began to settle in.

"The first day I arrived [in Ottawa], I joined the JCC," says Maimon.

He and his wife, Tal, and their sons Ofek, 4, and Naveh, 3, plan to get involved as quickly as possible in their new community, he says.

Asper donates $2 million to U of M

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Izzy Asper, the Winnipeg Jewish community's pre-eminent philanthropist, celebrated his 67th birthday recently with a $2 million gift to the University of Manitoba, his alma mater.

The donation, the largest in the history of the university, is in the form of an endowment that will go toward the establishment of the new Asper Chair in International Business and Trade Law.

The endowed chair, the first in the university's history, is to be filled by Dr. Bryan Schwartz, one of Canada's best known experts on constitutional and international law.

"The endowment gives us not only the resources to expand the number of courses we can offer, but will also include, over time, funding for publications, distinguished visitors, conferences and support for research by students and professors," says Harvey Secter, the new dean of law at the university.

"The new chair also helps to bring together the faculties of law and management, the two faculties which match what goes on in the real world of commerce and legal issues," Secter says.

This gift by Asper, the founder and chair of international media giant Canwest Global Communications Corp., is not his first to the university.

Two years ago, Asper – he graduated with a law degree in 1957 – gave the university $1 million to establish the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship within the faculty of management.

In the past couple of years, Asper, through the Asper Foundation, contributed $1 million toward construction of the Asper Jewish Community Campus which opened in September, 1997; and $500,000 to build a band-shell at Assiniboine Park, Winnipeg's biggest park.

The foundation also provides $90,000 annually for Grade 8 students at the Grey Academy, which is located at the Asper campus, to visit the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

Winnipeg Torah reader retires

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ernest Kern may well set a record as a Torah reader. The 88-year-old Holocaust survivor recently retired after 45 years as the Torah reader at the Kanee Centre of the Sharon Home, Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home.

Originally from the former Czechoslovakia, Kern studied at the yeshiva in Pressburg in the mid-1930s. He settled in Winnipeg in 1953 after stops in Palestine, Rome and Vienna.

He found work as a sewing-machine operator with the J.H. Hecht Company. Mr. Hecht, a past president of the Sharon Home, learned about Kern's ability to read Torah and recruited him for the home.

Kern hadn't missed a Shabbat service in all the years that he was the Torah reader at the synagogue in the home.

A spokesperson for the home says that the administration wanted to give him a retirement party of some kind, but Kern, a humble man, didn't want anyone to make a fuss over him.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

There is a saying among pollsters: "All is according to the question." Even if swayed by polls, most of us understand that the questions used in polls are designed to lead respondents towards particular conclusions.

This ought not come as a surprise given that most polls are not commissioned by impartial monitors of social, economic and political trends. Rather, the data is typically used and paid for by groups with a vested interest in a poll's conclusions.

If true in general, then this certainly applies to polls commissioned by political parties.

This brings us back to the recent Liberal caucus meeting in Halifax where the Liberal pollster Michael Marzolini provided the empirical data to support the course predetermined by the prime minister.

Seeing the numbers, the rank and file of the caucus suddenly fell into line.

The general media did not pursue this incongruity. Instead, the story of the Halifax gathering focused on Marzolini's discovery of an apparent surge in national support for the Progressive Conservative party and its alt-neu leader, Joe Clark.

Taken together with news reports of Preston Manning's underwhelming campaign-style visit to New Brunswick, it made for a seemingly credible insight.

It's a shame that no one considered the source of the revelation. If someone had, the first question that would come to mind is: "Why would the Liberals trumpet renewed support for their old nemesis, the Tories?"

Could it be that in an attempt to sabotage any chance of success in the "unite the right" effort, the Liberals offered Clark an illusion of progress in his struggle to revive the GOP of the North?

The Liberals are faced with an eventual resumption of Parliament. In the absence of any real agenda, what better way to further divide the opposition than to give a hopeless party new false hope? If so, it is difficult to conjure up a more cynical political ploy.

But even if we suspend any moral judgement regarding such a ploy, we are still confronted with a profoundly sad conclusion. Only a government wholly bankrupt of meaningful ideas would feel obliged to devise such tactics. Treading water may keep one's head above water, but it certainly doesn't get one very far, unless you count on the drift.

from Steve Ain, who is currently dividing his time between Toronto and New York.

Ain continues to serve as executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada two days a week. The balance of his work week is spent as interim chief operating officer of the New York-based United Jewish Communities, a recent merger of three national American organizations: United Jewish Appeal, the Council of Jewish Federations and United Israel Appeal of America.

Finkelstein's appointment in Toronto represents the breaking of a much-discussed glass ceiling in the organized Jewish community.

"I hadn't really thought of it that way, but yes," she said in an interview. "There are not a lot of females in senior positions in Jewish community organizations in North America. It's nice that UIA Federations is the first. Federations particularly are very conscious of the fact that there hasn't been a large representation of women in senior positions, particularly as the lead professional. It's a continuous issue."

Although more women are entering the field, there are no women among the chief professionals of the 20 largest Jewish federations in North America, she noted.

Among Finkelstein's roles during this transition year, she is involved in helping strengthen community links to Israel. A key component in that effort is the Partnership 2000 project, established in the early 1990s to facilitate people-to-people relationships between Israelis and Canadians.

Every community has different needs, and the Canadian Jewish community has needs on a national basis, noted David Goldstein, president of UIA Federations Canada. Among the organization's beneficiaries is Canadian Jewish Congress, he noted.

A lot of people mistakenly believe UIA sends money to Israel that Israel doesn't need, Goldstein said. In fact, 80 percent of UJA federation money allocated for overseas, goes to the former Soviet Union, he explained. The next 10 percent is used to help resettle new olim.

UIA Federations Canada is the "overall organization that provides the leadership, the funding and the direction for the Jews of Canada," said Goldstein. "If I can get people starting to sing off the same page, at the end of my term I feel I'll be a success."

Next week: a discussion with Steve Ain about his work at United Jewish Communities.

60 יאָר נאָכן אָנהויב פון דער מלחמה

וואָס עס איז געשען וויטער, איז שוין געשיכטע. דער טאָג פון ז־טן סעפּטעמבער, 1939, וועט אַבער אויף אײַביק פֿאַרבלײַבן אין מיין זכרון.

Witelson named recipient of McMaster U chair

By WENDY SCHNEIDER GOLDBLATT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — McMaster University recently announced that Sandra Witelson would be the recipient of the Albert Einstein/Irving Zucker endowed chair in neuroscience.

This event followed closely after the publication of her research paper on Einstein's brain.

Two months after her research results appeared in the medical journal, The Lancet, she and her team are still exhausted from dealing with a barrage of interview requests, speaking invitations and correspondence.

The research paper is dedicated to her late husband, who encouraged her to proceed with the project.

Media event

The chair at McMaster was made possible by a $1-million donation by Hamilton philanthropist Irving Zucker, and matching funds by the university.

At a reception held last June at the university president's residence, Zucker credited both Witelson and federal MP Sheila Copps, for persuading him that the university's department of neuroscience would be a worthy recipient of his generosity.

"All my life," he joked, "women have been telling me how and where to spend my money."

The McMaster University president said that the endowed chair is hugely significant, ensuring that "the decade of the brain will continue for decades at McMaster." He called it "the biggest media event in the university's history."

Witelson was born and raised in Montreal, receiving undergraduate and graduate degrees at McGill University.

The Witelsons moved to Hamilton in 1969. Sandra began her career as an assistant professor at McMaster and her husband opened a practice in ophthalmology.

While research has always been Witelson's great love, she also enjoys teaching, finding that it's a good balance.

"With the contact one has with students you not only prepare the next generation, but you learn so much. When you teach you're imparting information, and when you're doing research you're trying to discover and add to existing knowledge. And that's an extremely exciting occupation."

The Zucker donation takes on even more significance given that Witelson says that much of her time is spent filling out grant applications

Witelson's contact with Hamilton's Jewish community had been fairly limited until the death of her husband in 1997, when she was overwhelmed by an outpouring of warmth and support.

She has since spent many hours with Rabbi Morton Green and Rabbi Bernard Baskin talking about Jewish tradition and discussing the differences between Judaism as a belief system, and science.

"One doesn't try to prove or disprove a belief system even though it can be modified with the interpretation of the Torah and Talmud.

"But science," she said, "is something that is constantly changing in the sense that one has a hypothesis of how things work and then one tries to do experiments or studies to challenge that hypothesis. So it's not really what one believes but what the evidence supports."

Witelson says that while she's sufficiently awed by the "how" of religion, she is impressed with the wisdom of Jewish tradition.

"I'm in awe of the great psychological skills and perceptions that the early rabbinical scholars must have had about human behavior."

Winnipeg Jew running in election

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Michael Lazar, a prominent younger member of Winnipeg's Jewish community, is the only Jewish candidate running for any of the three major political parties in the current provincial campaign. The Manitoba election was called for Sept. 21.

Lazar is running for the Liberals in the north Winnipeg riding of Kildonan where the majority of the north Winnipeg Jewish community resides.

Within the Jewish community, Lazar has been a member of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council since 1989. He has been on the national executive of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

He has also served five years as chair of the midwest division of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights (1992-97) and recently he completed a two-year stint as vice-chair of the national body. In 1998, he was recognized by the community with the Harry Silverberg Leadership Development Award.

Although this is his first run at office, the Winnipeg lawyer has been an active member of the Liberal party since the mid 1970s. He was nominated for the riding in April.

"There is no question I am starting out as the underdog," he says.

"This is a strong NDP area although it does have a Liberal history as well. The current Member of Parliament for the area, Dr. Rey Pagtakhan, is a Liberal and a Liberal was elected in the 1988 provincial election."

The provincial Liberal party, however, is in poor shape. Except for 1998, the party has run a distant third in Manitoba elections for the last 30 years.

In the last election, the Liberals won just three seats and the party has been plagued by internal strife much of the time since that election.

Lazar recognizes that what he needs to win is a strong Liberal campaign and a crossover of disgruntled Tory votes. He says that he has met with a positive response in the early stages of the campaign.

Rosh Hashanah

Celebrating Rosh Hashanah - Sephardi style!

By RAHEL MUSLEAH
Special to the CJN

Tachel shanah u-birchotehah! Let the new year begin with all its blessings.

With this hearty declaration, the Rosh Hashanah feast begins in my home. But, like many families of Sephardi and Mizrachi origin, we don't actually eat the meal until we have recited many blessings in the context of a special Rosh Hashanah seder.

The seder consists of symbolic foods that represent our wishes for the new year. It is called a seder yehi ratzon (may it be God's will), because we ask God to guide us and provide us with bounty, strength and peace in the year ahead. Many of the foods are blessed with puns on their Hebrew names that turn into hopes that our enemies will be destroyed.

The talmudic origins of the seder date back to a discussion by Rabbi Abaye about omens that carry significance (Horayot 12a). He suggested that at the beginning of each new year, people should make a habit of eating the following foods that grow in profusion and are therefore symbolic of prosperity: pumpkin, a bean-like vegetable called rubia, leeks, beets and dates. Jewish communities throughout the world have adapted this practice, creating seders of their own.

This version of the seder was conducted in Calcutta, where my family is from. Though it delays the main meal by a few extra minutes, your Rosh Hashanah celebration will be enriched, infused with the blessings of life none of us should take for granted.

Arrange seven bowls on a platter and fill them with the following fruits and vegetables: dates, pomegranates, apples in honey, string beans, pumpkin, spinach and scallions. The original custom calls for a fish head to represent fertility, as well as a sheep's head: a tangible symbol of our wish to be heads, not tails – leaders, not stragglers. The sheep's head (the brains were removed and cooked) also served as a reminder of the ram that saved Isaac's life; we recite the story of the binding of Isaac on the second day of Rosh Hashanah. In my family, however, we have discontinued using these last two items: the fish because its Hebrew name, dag, sounds like the Hebrew word for worry, d'agah; the sheep's head, for obvious reasons.

Dates: Temarim

Advance preparation: Stuff pitted dates with walnuts.

At the seder: Pass around the bowl of dates and before eating, recite together: May it be Your will, God, that all enmity will end. May we date this new year with peace and happiness. (The word for "end," yitamu, sounds like tamar, the Hebrew word for date.)

Baruch Atah HaShem, Elokeinu Melech ha-olam, borei p'ri ha'etz. Blessed are You, Lord, Ruler of the universe, Who has created the fruit of the tree.

Pomegranate: Rimon

Advance preparation: Peel and remove all seeds from the pomegranate. Place the seeds in a bowl. If pomegranates are difficult to find, you may substitute figs, which also have numerous seeds. Try counting the number of seeds – if you have the patience.

At the seder: Pass around the bowl of pomegranate seeds, and before eating, recite: May we be as full of mitzvot as the pomegranate is full of seeds.

If you haven't counted the number of seeds, guess the average number a pomegranate has. Hint: It has something to do with the number of mitzvot in the Torah.

Apples in honey: Tapuach b'dvash

Here's where Ashkenazi and Sephardi tradition meet.

Advance preparation: Slice apples, and dip in honey, or create a traditional apple preserve by cooking apple quarters until they are soft in a small amount of water sweetened with sugar and spiced with whole cloves and rosewater.

At the seder: Pass around the apple, and before eating, recite: May it be Your will, God, to renew for us a year as good and sweet as honey.

String Beans: Rubia or Lubia

In India, where my family is from, we used a long bean with many seeds in the pod, called lubia, which is so similar to the original rubia that it may be the same vegetable. (The Soncino Talmud translates rubia as fenugreek, a tiny, bitter seed.) This bean is available in Indian and Chinese grocery shops. Otherwise, substitute string beans.

Advance preparation: Boil beans and place in bowl.

At the seder: Pass around beans and before eating, recite: May it be Your will, God, to increase our merits. (The word for "increase," irbu, resembles the word rubia.)

Baruch Atah HaShem, Elokeinu Melech ha'olam, borei p'ri ha-adamah. Blessed are You, Lord, Who has created the fruit of the earth.

By this point in the seder, the sweet foods have been replaced with vegetables. For children who are not vegetable lovers, it's good to know that the smallest bite is enough to fulfil the requirements of reciting the blessing. As I did when I was a child (all right, I still do it), you might encourage your children to reserve a piece of apple, pomegranate or date to sweeten their palate after munching on beans, spinach and scallions.

Pumpkin or Gourd: K'ra

Advance preparation: Boil pumpkin or gourd. If you use pumpkin, you can mash it and sweeten to taste with brown sugar or honey, cinnamon and ground cloves. Or open a can of pumpkin pie filling!

At the seder: Pass around pumpkin and before eating, recite: As we eat this gourd, may it be Your will, God, to guard us. Tear away all evil decrees against us as our merits are called before You. (K'ra resembles the words for "tear" and "called.")

Spinach or Beetroot Leaves: Selek

Advance preparation: boil spinach or beetroot leaves.

At the seder: Pass around spinach or beetroot leaves, and before eating, recite: May it be Your will, God, to banish all the enemies who might beat us. (Selek resembles the word for "banish," yistalku.)

Leeks or Scallions: Karti

Advance preparation: Slice leeks or scallions. Cook leeks in a little

You can have your cake and eat it as well!

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Cinnamon Hearts is an excellent and informative newsletter for diabetics and their families. The following are some cake and dessert recipes using honey, which appeared in the 1998 autumn issue. I have not yet had a chance to test all of the recipes personally, but they are from a reliable source and I'm sure you'll have great success! They have been reprinted with permission.

The dietary exchanges are American, but can easily be used by Canadians.

It is important to note that sugars are only one source of food energy. Just like other ingredients in food, sugars, in moderation, can still be part of a healthy diet. People with diabetes need to monitor their carbohydrate intake. Speak to your dietitian or physician for guidance.

Please note: If you have diabetes that is not tightly controlled, DO NOT eat sugary foods until your blood glucose readings are in the normal range and maintained.

For further information, contact Cinnamon Hearts DLE, PO Box 578340, Modesto, Calif., 95357-8340. Subscriptions:$21.80 US per year. Sample issue:$5 US.

The following recipes use easily available ingredients and can be enjoyed by both diabetics and non-diabetics alike. Have a sweet year!

HONEY CAKE (LEKACH)

Source: National Honey Board

½ cup strong coffee
1 cup honey
1 tbsp. brandy (optional)
2 eggs
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
½ cup brown sugar
2 cups all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. baking powder
1½ tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground ginger
⅛ tsp. ground nutmeg
⅛ tsp. ground cloves

Enjoy sugars in moderation

Preheat oven to 300. Coat a 9-inch square pan with vegetable spray.

Combine coffee, honey and brandy; mix well and set aside.

Beat eggs in large mixing bowl; add oil and brown sugar.

Combine flour, baking powder, baking soda and spices in medium bowl; mix well.

Add flour mixture to egg mixture alternately with honey mixture. Blend well. Pour batter into prepared pan.

Bake 55 to 60 minutes or until cake springs back when lightly touched. Makes 12 Servings.

Per serving: 237 cal.; 4 g fat; 48 g carb.; 40 mg chol.; 288 mg sodium.

Exchanges: 2 starch; 1 fat.

HONEY PUMPKIN MOUSSE

Source: National Honey Board
A new, not-so-traditional honey dessert.

4 eggs, separated
¼ cup honey
1 can (16 oz) solid pack pumpkin
2 tsp. all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. ground ginger
¼ tsp. ground nutmeg
¼ tsp. salt

In the top of a double boiler, combine egg whites and honey. Cook over simmering water, stirring constantly, until mixture reaches 160. Transfer mixture to a medium bowl. Using electric mixer on high speed, beat egg whites until cool and glossy peaks form; set aside.

In a medium saucepan, combine egg yolks, pumpkin, flour, spices and salt. Cook over medium heat, stirring constantly, until mixture boils; remove from heat.

Gently stir ¼ of the beaten egg whites into pumpkin mixture; gradually fold remaining egg whites into lightened mixture. Spoon mousse into dessert glasses; cover and chill. Makes 6 servings.

Per serving: 217 cal.; 4 g fat; 42 g carb.; 6 g protein; 2 g fiber; 160 mg chol.; 149 mg sodium.

Exchanges: ½ starch; 1 protein; ½ fat.

PLUM HONEY TEA BREAD

Source: National Honey Board

2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. ground nutmeg
¾ cup buttermilk
½ cup honey
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 egg, beaten
3 plums, pitted and chopped
½ cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 325. Coat a 9x5x3-inch loaf pan with vegetable spray.

Combine dry ingredients in a large bowl; mix well. Combine remaining ingredients except plums and walnuts in a small bowl; mix until blended. Stir buttermilk mixture into flour mixture until just moistened. Fold in plums and nuts.

Pour into prepared pan and bake at 325 for 50 to 55 minutes, or until wooden pick inserted near centre comes out clean. During baking, cover top with foil after 25 minutes to prevent overbrowning. Makes 8 servings.

Per serving: 191 cal.; 6 g fat; 31 g carb.; 2 g fiber; 5 g protein; 20 mg chol.; 141 mg sodium.

Exchanges: 1 starch; 1 fat.

Couples work side by side in the kitchen

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

In the earlier decades of this century, the men generally went to work and the women stayed home.

The division of labor tended to be clear – the men brought home the brisket, so to speak, and the women cooked it.

In this day and age of dual family incomes, the division of labor in the home is not as clear cut. Some couples divide household chores evenly. Many do not.

For some couples, meal preparation and clean-up are shared tasks. Usually one spouse cooks and the other does the clean-up and some take turns doing both.

There are other couples who actually cook together, divvying up the steps of the recipe – for example, one cuts and chops, while the other mixes.

Cooking together may be a good recipe for marital harmony, or another way to spice up a marriage.

The CJN interviewed Sarah and Mark Turkienicz, a couple who seem to have perfected their tag-team approach to cooking with their marinated salads.

They shared their recipes and thoughts on co-operative cooking.

Married for 18 years, Sarah and Mark, the parents of three boys, began sharing some cooking responsibilities about seven or eight years ago when Mark got interested in cooking, Sarah said.

"He would make small things like salad dressing and cooked salads. He's an expert in barbecuing steaks. I can't say he will cook an entire meal – beginning to end – but if he enjoys making a particular dish he does it. He's our salad chef."

For the last four or five years, the couple have been cooking several traditional Sephardi salads. The following recipes are for roasted pepper and marinated eggplant salads.

Sarah, who was born in Israel, said she ate these salads when she was growing up and learned to make them from her mother.

"They are definitely Sephardi dishes…Both salads have the same kind of character – one is made with eggplant and one is with peppers.

"These are the kinds of salads that you eat before a festive meal… Little plates with all kinds of appetizers like eggplant salad, hummus and techinah are served with pita and other breads and eaten until the meal actually comes.

"Mark always loved all these salads, and when he first got interested in making them, he started by doing the barbecuing."

While he is is now able to make the entire salad, the couple divides the labor, she said. "Mark usually barbecues. He also peels and cuts the peppers into strips. I normally do the dressing."

ROASTED PEPPER SALAD

We always barbecue the peppers, Sarah said. "The rich flavor that you get from the peppers comes from the roasting."

And while she uses a combination of sweet green and hot red peppers — the different colors make it easy for people to identify the hot peppers – she says it's not necessary to use any hot peppers.

6 to 8 cubanell peppers, which are thinner and longer than the more common bell peppers
4 small thin red hot peppers

Dressing
½ cup olive oil
4 cloves of garlic (optional) peeled and chopped
½ cup of lemon juice or the juice from one lemon
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. cumin

Grill or roast the peppers leaving them whole, with the stems and seeds intact. Do not peel, poke or cut them. Roast the peppers slowly on all side until there are black patches and the skin starts bubbling.

Put the peppers inside a covered pot – metal or glass – for 10 minutes. The condensation from keeping the roasted peppers covered will help loosen the skin and make it easier to peel them.

Take the peppers out one by one. Remove the skin with fingers. "It peels off easier than a banana," Sarah said.

Remove the stem and seeds from inside. Lightly rinse the peppers and then cut them cut into thin strips (1/4 -inch wide) on a cutting board. All the peppers – sweet and hot – are treated the same way. Put them in a bowl.

Combine the ingredients for the dressing – cumin, garlic, salt, lemon and oil – and add them to the bowl of peppers. Gently mix with a fork and refrigerate in a covered bowl. Use as needed.

This is enough for approximately three 250-ml jars. It will keep for a good two weeks.

MARINATED EGGPLANT SALAD

2 large eggplants, washed with stem and leaves removed.
4 to 5 cloves of garlic, chopped or minced
2 green onions, finely chopped, including the entire stem
2 sprigs of parsley, chopped fine
1/4 tsp black pepper
1/4 cup olive oil
1/4 cup balsamic vinegar

Slice eggplant horizontally into 1/4-inch thick slices. Lay the slices flat, cover them with salt on both sides and let them sit for about half an hour. The eggplant starts to sweat and little beads of water come out, and it may turn a little brown. (The salt removes the bitterness.) Rinse the slices under running water and pat dry with paper towels.

Barbecue eggplant slices. Brush them with olive oil to keep them moist, so that they don't stick to the grill. Keep brushing them with oil as they are cooking. When they are ready, the slices should have brown grill lines or stripes.

In a small bowl combine garlic, onions and parsley.

Take a platter that has a cover, preferably a shallow pyrex dish. Place a layer of eggplant slices in the dish. Sprinkle on the herb mixture. Prepare another layer and sprinkle on the herb mixture. Alternate the eggplant and herb layers until everything is finished.

In a separate bowl, combine the pepper, oil and vinegar together until they are mixed completely. Gently pour this mixture over the layers of eggplant. Cover and refrigerate. The salad tastes better a day later, after it has marinated.

Transfer to a serving dish. Serve the slices on the bottom first because they have been marinated longest.

Sarah said while Mark is barbecuing the eggplant, she chops the herbs for the dressing. "He grills. I usually cut and salt [the eggplant]. I mince the garlic, onions and parsley; he makes the dressing and pours it."

Having grown up in a home with both European and Sephardi cooking traditions, Mark said his interest in cooking started when Sarah began taking a cooking course in Thornhill a number of years ago.

"She was trying different dishes. What intrigued me the most were the sauces and their variations."

Mark explained how he began cooking the marinated cooked salads with Sarah. "I was overly critical one time. I said why don't you try more salt or more pepper? After that, it became a joint effort and a joint project."

He likes to barbecue. "A few years ago, instead of offering coffee and tea to visitor, I would say, 'How about a steak?' More than once I got taken up on the offer. That was eight or nine years ago. Now people are watching their cholesterol."

He notes that barbecuing the vegetables takes 30 minutes of constant attention.

While their three boys, Eric, 14, Ryan, 11, and David, 8, have not yet acquired a taste for these marinated salads, the couple gets many requests for jars of the salads, Mark said. "When we do the eggplant, there's a lineup for the jars from my immediate family... We prepare the jars with their names on them."

Chicken soup just like Golda used to make

By SOL MARSHALL
Special to The CJN

Some time ago, a friend asked me if I could supply the recipe for Golda Meir's famous chicken soup. There were many stories about how she welcomed world dignitaries during the time she was one of Israel's top government leaders.

Following the usual round of polite exchanges at the first meeting, she would suggest that they come to her home for dinner. The heimishe meals were credited with setting a climate that led to friendly and co-operative relations with many countries.

After looking through my collection of Jewish and general cookbooks, I had to confess that I had no record of this recipe. Then I called a half dozen other people, all of whom had recalled hearing about it, but could not help me with specifics.

A paragraph about this in my cookbook column, The Menu Maven, resulted in a postcard from a reader who wrote that George Putnam had the recipe and in years past, he had mailed copies to listeners. I wrote to Putnam at Los Angeles radio station KIEV, requesting a copy.

Then came a letter from another reader, enclosing a photocopy of the recipe, typed on a letterhead of the Israeli consul general in Los Angeles. The lead paragraph told the story.

"Dear George: Prime Minister Golda Meir asked me to transmit to you her favorite chicken soup recipe as promised during her visit to Los Angeles." It was signed by Y. Carmel.

What I like about these recipes is the style of the instructions, just like a Jewish mother. Only one specific quantity is mentioned – two beaten eggs.

GOLDA MEIR'S CHICKEN SOUP

Cook the chicken with parsley, celery, cut-up carrots, peeled onions, salt, pepper, a pinch of paprika, until the chicken is tender, usually less than two hours.

Meir generally served soup with knaidlach, prepared as follows:

Knaidlach:

Soak matzot in cold water until soft, then squeeze dry. Crush with a fork and add to it fried onions and a little oil, some parsley, salt, pepper and two beaten eggs. Add enough matzah meal for binding. Make into small balls and set aside for one hour. Drop the matzah balls into the boiling soup and cook for about half an hour.

broth if desired.

At the seder: Pass around leeks or scallions and before eating, recite: May it be Your will, God, to cut off all our enemies. (Karti resembles yikartu, the word for "cut off.")

Add the following English version of the blessing, if you like. It's from the New Year Siddur by David De Sola Pool, published by the Union of Sephardic Congregations: "Like as we eat this leek may our luck never lack in the year to come." De Sola Pool's other translations of the blessings are equally as "punny."

You can also create your own translations of the blessings, or think up new ones based on the symbolic foods. And if you still want to end the seder by wishing for heads, not tails, consider the vegetarian version: a head of lettuce!

In any case, may the year ahead be full of blessings! Tachel shanah u-virchotehah.

She also presents programs on the Jewish communities of India. Her own pomegranate count revealed 612 seeds, just one shy of the 613 that correspond to the mitzvot in the Torah. You can let her know if you've used this seder by contacting her at Rahelmus@aol.com.*

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Kugel courtesy of CJN staff

Given the task of searching out exotic kugel recipes, The CJN staff rose to the occasion and submitted some unusual, some not so unusual kugels that could give a slightly different touch to your meals this holiday season. Although not tested, each recipe has the reputation for turning out well.

EXOTIC PARSLEY KUGEL

1 bunch parsley
1 bunch coriander
1 bunch green onions
2-3 stalks celery
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
4 eggs
4 tbsp. bread crumbs
1 tbsp. instant chicken soup mix a dash of white pepper
black pepper, cumin
all-spice and cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. In food processor, dice all ingredients. In a large bowl mix in eggs, oil, bread crumbs, chicken soup powder and spices. Grease a 10-inch square baking pan. Bake for about 30-45 minutes or until firm and puffy. Serve with lemon wedges.

CRUSTY TOPPED NOODLE KUGEL

1 package (8 oz.) cream cheese, softened
½ cup margarine, softened
1 cup sugar
8 eggs, well beaten
4½ cups milk
2 tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. lemon juice
dash salt
8 oz. egg noodles
½ cup graham cracker crumbs
1 tsp. cinnamon

Beat together cream cheese and margarine. Add sugar, mix well. Blend in eggs. Stir in next four ingredients. Cook noodles as directed, drain. Combine with cheese mixture. Pour into 13x9x2-inch baking dish. Mix graham cracker and cinnamon; sprinkle on top of noodles.

Bake at 350 for 1¼ hours or until browned and crusty on top. Allow to cool for 30 minutes. Cut into squares. Serves 10-12.

Note: This kugel tastes wonderful served with sour cream and strawberries.

CRANBERRY PEACH OATMEAL KUGEL

1 can whole cranberry sauce
1 16-oz. can of sliced peaches, without the juice. Peaches in light juice have 60 percent less calories.
2 cups uncooked oatmeal
¾ cups flour
½ cup vegetable oil
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup brown sugar (can be reduced to taste)

Mix dry ingredients plus oil. Grease 8-inch square pan. Spread half of dry ingredients in pan. In separate bowl, drain peaches and mix with cranberry sauce. Pour that mixture into the pan. Add remaining dry mixture. Bake uncovered at 350 degrees for one hour. Serve hot. Serves 6-8.

JERUSALEM KUGEL

2 tsp. salt, or to taste
1 lb. capellini (very thin noodles)
½ cup vegetable oil
¾ cup sugar
4 eggs
1½ to 2 tsp. freshly ground pepper

Bring 3 quarts water to boil. Add 1 tsp. salt and noodles. Cook and drain.

Preheat oven to 350. In a medium saucepan, heat the oil and ½ cup of the sugar. Stir constantly until the sugar turns very dark, almost black (about 10 minutes).

Add this hot caramel to the pasta and mix well. Cool slightly.

Beat the eggs in another bowl. Add remaining salt, pepper, cinnamon and remaining sugar. Pour into the pasta mixture and toss well.

Transfer to a greased tube pan and bake, uncovered, for 1 hour, or until golden on top.

Remove from the oven, turn upside down on a serving plate, unmold and serve. Serves 6-8.

Puddings

CHOCOLATE CHIP NOODLE PUDDING

Topping:
½ cup all purpose flour
½ cup quick or old-fashioned rolled oats (do not use instant oatmeal!)
½ cup firmly packed light brown sugar
1½ tsp. cinnamon
5 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted
Pudding:
1 cup golden raisins
1 cup semisweet chocolate chips (6 oz. package)
1 8-oz. package wide egg noodles
2 large eggs
grated rind of 1 large – deep-colored – orange (no white pith)
¼ cup plus 2 tbsp. granulated sugar
1½ cups whole milk or part skim ricotta
1 cup sour cream
2 tbsp. dark rum

For topping:

In small bowl, combine flour, oats, brown sugar and cinnamon. Stir thoroughly, breaking up any lumps of brown sugar with back of spoon. All at once, add melted butter. Stir until well-mixed. Set aside at room temperature until needed.

For pudding:

Adjust rack to centre of oven: preheat oven to 350. Butter a 2½-quart shallow non-metal baking dish. Set aside. In 3-quart pot, bring about 2½ quarts lightly salted water to a rapid boil.

Combine raisins and chocolate chips in small bowl and set aside.

Add noodles to rapidly boiling salted water. Stir well; bring back to boil and boil just until tender (it takes about 8 minutes). Meanwhile, in large bowl, combine eggs, sugar, and orange rind. With large spoon, beat until well-mixed. Add ricotta and sour cream. Mix in rum. Add mixture to drained noodles and raisin mixture.

Pour into prepared pan. Cover with topping. Bake for one hour.

PINEAPPLE NOODLE KUGEL

1 16-oz. package medium noodles
2 tbsp. sugar
juice of ½ lemon
2 eggs separated
2 cups unsweetened applesauce
½ cup butter or margarine melted
½ cup raisins, dried cranberries, or dried cherries
1 8 oz. can unsweetened pineapple chunks or crushed pineapple

Cook noodles as package directs. After cooking noodles, mix in all ingredients except pineapple and egg whites. Beat egg white until stiff and fold in. Bake in greased 13x9-inch glass baking pan at 350 for 1 hour. Pour pineapple chunks over top of casserole with half of juice from can and return to oven for 10 minutes. Serves 12.

APRICOT NOODLE PUDDING

1 package (8 oz.) medium noodles
4 eggs
1 lb. jar unsweetened apple sauce
¼ cup cut up dried apricots
¾ cup sugar
¼ cup melted butter or pareve margarine

Preheat oven to 350. Melt butter in 8x10-inch glass baking pan while warming the pan. Cook noodles as directed on package for baking. Beat eggs well. Combine all ingredients and bake for approximately 1 hour or until done. Serves 6-8.

FAYGEL'S CHEDDAR CHEESE KUGEL

12 oz. package noodles, cooked
¼ lb. melted margarine
1 scant cup sugar
3 eggs separated
1 cup grated cheddar cheese
½ pint sour cream

Beat egg whites until stiff. Add ½ of whites to sugar, butter, sour cream, cheese and noodles. Put into large pyrex dish. Spread whites on top. Bake 350 for 1 hour.

Serve with sour cream and frozen strawberries. Serves 12.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Homemade baked delights a holiday tradition

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I have always loved to bake. Actually, what I liked best was licking the bowl clean! When I was a little girl, I would stand on a chair beside my mother and watch her mix up the most delicious batters for cakes, cookies and yeast doughs. Her recipes were plain and simple, but they were the best!

Once her cake went into the oven, my mother would send me outside to play until it was finished baking "so the cake won't fall." She knew that I wouldn't dare wander very far away, for fear of missing out on the magical moment when the ingredients would be transformed from a panful of sticky batter to an irresistible delight.

My Baba once bought a small, dense chunk of honey cake at the local bakery. When she complained about how expensive it was, my mother declared: "No wonder it costs so much. It's heavy like a stone! My cakes are much lighter - and taste much better!"

With today's busy schedules, we often don't have time to indulge in baking. But when the holidays come around, it's traditional to serve homemade baked delights. If you're very busy, why not ask one of your guests to bake one of their specialties?

Here are some delicious recipes that my friends have shared with me. I've also included a brand new recipe I've developed for a luscious honey cake that combines apples with honey – two traditional ingredients for a sweet and healthy New Year. Enjoy!

NORENE'S HONEY APPLE CAKE

This is a delicious low fat cake to help you celebrate a sweet Jewish New Year.

3 eggs plus 2 egg whites (or 4 eggs)
1 cup sugar
⅓ cup canola oil
1 cup liquid honey
3 cups plus 3 tbsp. flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground ginger
¼ cup cold tea
¼ cup brandy
1 cup firmly packed apples, peeled, cored and grated (about 2)

Preheat oven to 325. Spray a 10-inch bundt or tube pan with non-stick spray. In the food processor, beat eggs, egg whites, sugar and oil until light. Add honey; mix well. Combine dry ingredients and spices. Add to batter alternately with tea and brandy. Mix just until blended.

Mix in apples with quick on/off turns. Pour batter into pan.

Bake at 325 for 1 hour and 10 minutes, or until cake tests done (a wooden skewer inserted into the centre should come out dry). Otherwise, bake cake a few minutes longer, covering the top with foil to prevent overbrowning. Remove cake from oven and let cool for 20 minutes.

Carefully loosen cake from pan with a flexible spatula; invert onto a serving plate. Yields 20 servings, and freezes well.

ETHEL'S EASY CARROT CAKE

Source: Everyday Cooking for the Jewish Home by Ethel Hofman.

Carrots are symbolic of a sweet, fulfilling year, which is why they are popular on Rosh Hashanah. Here they are used in an unlikely processed form – baby food – to produce a rich-tasting, moist cake with none of the work of peeling and grating that is usually involved.

3 cups flour
2 cups granulated sugar
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. salt
1½ cups vegetable oil
2 (6-ounce) jars junior baby food carrots
4 eggs, beaten
2 tsp. vanilla extract
½ cup crystallized ginger, chopped
3 tbsp. powdered sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Coat a 13x9x2-inch baking pan with non-stick vegetable spray.

In a large bowl, mix flour, granulated sugar, baking powder, baking soda, cinnamon, and salt. Make a well in centre and add oil, carrots, eggs and vanilla. Beat with a wooden spoon to mix well. Fold in chopped ginger.

Pour into prepared pan. Bake in preheated oven for 1 hour, or until a toothpick inserted in center comes out clean.

Let cool completely, then cut into squares. Before serving, dust with powdered sugar. Makes 20 to 24 servings.

LISA'S BISCOTTI-STYLE CHOCOLATE CHIP MANDELBREAD

Truly delicious! It's hard to control myself when Lisa Brass serves these.

1 cup oil
1 cup sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
2 cups flour mixed with 1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup chocolate chips
1 cup slivered almonds
approximately ½-¾ cup cinnamon-sugar

Combine oil and sugar; mix well. Beat in eggs and vanilla. Mix in flour and baking soda mixture. Mix in chocolate chips and almonds. Use a large spoon to spread mixture into three logs on a greased cookie sheet. Bake at 350 for 30 minutes. Remove from oven and let cool for 5 minutes. Cut on the diagonal into ¾-inch strips. Sprinkle the side facing up with lots of cinnamon and sugar. Bake 30 minutes longer at 275. Turn mandelbread over and sprinkle with additional cinnamon and sugar. Bake 30 minutes more.

PHYLLIS' BREAD MACHINE CHALLAH

This delicious recipe comes from my friend Phyllis Hecker, who is a mashgiach in Albany, N.Y.

It was given to her by her friend Dr. Russ Fradkin, "the baking optometrist!" Wait until you see the results. It's a winner!

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Enjoy some homemade baked delights

¼ cup water
6 tbsp. oil
2 eggs
3¼ cups all-purpose bread flour
1½ tsp. salt
4 tbsp. sugar
2 tsp. yeast

Add ingredients to your bread machine in the order given. This recipe should be processed on the dough cycle. (If dough seems a little dry, add an extra tablespoon or two of water at the beginning of the mixing cycle.)

When dough is doubled in bulk, remove it from bread machine. Punch down the dough. Divide it into three equal pieces and braid the challah on a greased cookie sheet. Cover and let rise until doubled, about one hour. For a shiny challah, beat 1 egg with 2 tbsp. of water and brush challah before baking.

In a preheated 350 degree oven, bake challah for 30-40 minutes. Cover loosely with foil if it gets too dark.

Note: The lazy baker will get excellent bread using the above recipe in a bread machine on the bread cycle.

Variation:

Add 3 tbsp. dried dill and ¼ cup dehydrated onions along with the rest of the ingredients and prepare as directed above.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Healthy food can be tasty as well

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When was the last time you promised yourself to eat properly? Last week? Ten minutes ago?

The problem, of course, no matter how good your intentions are, your brain drools over comfort foods replete with fats, starches and sugars.

And when someone near you digs into steaming french fries – well.

There is hope in two dynamite cookbooks that offer good food in both the health and tastebud sense.

Both have Healthy Cooking as a major part of their titles: Healthy Cooking For People Who Don't Have Time to Cook, by Jeanne Jones (Rodale Press, 1999, originally published 1997), and The French Culinary Institute's Salute to Healthy Cooking from America's Foremost French Chefs (FCI) (Rodale Press, 1998).

Jones' book is excellent. Not only are the recipes quick to prepare (some are ready in only 15 minutes, others may have to marinate or roast, but take only 30 minutes of actual preparation time), but they are consistently tasty and appealing.

Chicken is stewed with fennel, salmon on angel hair pasta is perked up with ginger sauce, and pear slices are made delectable with honey pepper sauce.

The photographs make the food look irresistible.

A good feature of this book is the number of hints to make the cooking go even faster, such as substituting couscous for rice; and suggestions for leftovers, such as turning chili into soup by simply adding vegetable or chicken stock.

You wouldn't expect to find "healthy" and "French cooking" in the same sentence, let alone in the same cookbook, but the French Culinary Institute has managed it. Would you really suffer if you were offered essence of sauteed red peppers, or roasted eggplant with marinated goat cheese?

Many of the recipes are impossible for the kosher kitchen, but just as many are acceptable or adaptable. And yes, there is kosher goat cheese.

The book is arranged by season, which is an interesting touch, and, again, the photographs are superb.

FENNEL A LA GREQUE
(from FCI)

2 large bulbs fennel
2 tsp. olive oil
1 small onion, thinly sliced
¼ cup dry white wine juice of 1 lemon
½ tsp. coriander seeds
1 bay leaf
1 large sprig fresh thyme pinch paprika
salt
2 lemons, cut crosswise into ¼-inch slices
½ cup fresh flat-leaf parsley leaves

Remove any hard or discolored outer layers from the fennel bulbs. Trim and discard the root ends and the feathery tops. Cut the bulbs in half lengthwise, then cut each half into 8 wedges, leaving the core intact to keep the fennel from falling apart when cooked.

Warm the oil in a large nonstick saute pan over medium heat. Add onions and saute for 10 minutes or until soft but not browned. Stir in the wine, lemon juice, coriander seeds, bay leaf, thyme, paprika and fennel. Season with salt. Cover and simmer for 15 minutes, or until the fennel is tender when pierced with a knife. Allow to cool to room temperature. Remove and discard the bay leaf and thyme sprig.

Place equal portions of the fennel in the centre of each of 4 salad plates. Surround with a circle of alternating lemon slices and parsley leaves. Serves 4.

ROASTED APPLES WRAPPED IN PHYLLO, BOURDELOT-STYLE

4 large cooking apples (eg. Court lands)
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
2 tbsp. kosher apple brandy
8 squares (6-inch) phyllo dough water
2 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
1 large egg, lightly beaten

Preheat oven to 375. Carefully core the apples, making sure that you do not cut through the bottom. Place 1½ tsp. of the sugar in each apple. Pour 1½ tsp. of the brandy into each apple.

Place 4 of the phyllo squares in a row on a work surface. Keep the remainder covered with a damp paper towel. Using a pastry brush, lightly coat each square with water. Dust each square with brown sugar. Top each square with another piece of phyllo. Brush with water and dust with brown sugar.

Place an apple in the centre of each layered phyllo square. Bring the sides up, folding and tucking as necessary, to completely cover the apple. Tuck any excess dough down into the core area of the apple. Using a pastry brush, lightly coat each apple with the egg.

Place on a nonstick baking sheet. Bake for 20 minutes, or until the apples are tender when pierced with a knife, and the phyllo is crisp and golden brown.

ZESTY ORANGE AND ONION RICE
(from Jones)

2 tsp. extra-virgin olive oil
2 garlic cloves, pressed or minced
1 medium onion, chopped
2 cups orange juice
1 tsp. dried oregano, crushed
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
⅛ tsp. crushed red-pepper flakes (or to taste)
1 ½ cups uncooked quick-cooking brown rice

Combine oil and garlic in a medium saucepan and cook over medium heat for about 1 minute, or until the garlic sizzles. Add onions and continue to cook, stirring frequently, for 3 minutes, or until the onions are translucent.

Add orange juice, oregano, salt, pepper, cinnamon and red-pepper flakes. Bring to a boil over high heat. Stir in the rice. Cover, reduce the heat to low and cook for 10 minutes, or until the liquid is absorbed. Fluff with a fork. Makes 4 cups.

FILLET OF SOLE IN GINGERED LEMON SAUCE

¼ cup fresh lemon juice
1½ tsp. cornstarch
1 tsp. grated fresh ginger
1 tsp. grated lemon rind, yellow part only
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. salt
4 small sole fillets (about 4 oz. each)
1 lemon, peeled and thinly sliced, optional

Preheat oven to 350. Combine lemon juice and cornstarch in a small saucepan and stir until the cornstarch is dissolved. Stir in the ginger, lemon rind, cinnamon and salt. Cook over low heat, stirring constantly, until slightly thickened.

Place the sole in an 11 x 7-inch baking dish. Pour the sauce evenly over the top. Cover tightly and bake for about 10 to 12 minutes, or until the fish turns opaque and is easily flaked with a fork. Transfer the fish to serving plates, top with the sauce and garnish with lemon slices, if using. Serves 4.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Diabetic recipes for the High Holidays

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I recently discovered a wonderful newsletter called Cinnamon Hearts, which is geared to people with diabetes. Marilyn Helton, the editor, firmly believes that diabetics don't need to cook from special cookbooks. With knowledge and a little common sense, they can enjoy the same foods as the rest of the family.

Although it is not a kosher newsletter, Cinnamon Hearts is jam packed with recipes and cooking tips which will be of interest to CJN readers. You'll also find cookbook reviews, healthy lifestyle articles, advice on weight loss and nutrition, plus tips for feeding young children with diabetes.

Below you will find recipes from Patti Lynch, a featured chef in the November-December 1998 issue, and Kathy Kochan, a regular contributor to the newsletter.

When Patti Lynch's husband was diagnosed with diabetes, she tried to find suitable cookbooks.

However, she found that the recipes were "bland, boring, difficult and all the desserts tasted like cardboard." Using her creative talents, she created recipes that were "as good as they could get." She worked with the American Diabetes Association and wrote three cookbooks: Sweet Inspirations, Gourmet Inspirations and Kids Stuffin's.

Patti discovered that nonfat yogurt is a good substitute for most of the fat in any dessert recipe, except for pie or cookie crusts. She reminds us to "eat color, especially all of those healthy items which are the most colorful and textural foods you can find."

For further information on Patti Lynch's books, write to Sweet Inspirations, 1420 NW Gilman Blvd. #2258 Issaquah, Washington, 98027.

Kathy Kochan, cookbook author and columnist, was diagnosed with diabetes at age five and has lived with it for more than 40 years. She prefers to use a minimum of sugar in most of her recipes, but occasionally uses artificial sweeteners in her desserts.

Kathy says, "We just must be aware of the total amount of carbohydrates consumed in relation to the amount of insulin we are taking."

Her recipe for Yummy Chocolate Cupcakes can be enjoyed without guilt by diabetics and non-diabetics alike. They make a terrific treat for kids.

For further information on Kathy Kochan's The Diabetic Goodie Book, call 1-800-322-5679.

Editor Marilyn Helton recommends that diabetics keep their carbohydrate intake as close to or less than 30 grams per serving as possible. She gave me permission to reprint these recipes from back issues of her newsletter. For further information, contact Cinnamon Hearts DLE, PO Box 578340, Modesto, Calif., 95357-8340. Subscriptions: $21.80 US per year. Sample issue: $5 US.

Please note: The dietary exchanges are American but can easily be used by Canadians.

So whether you're cooking for a diabetic or not, these recipes are sure to bring pleasure to your holiday table. Enjoy in good health!

PATTI'S STUFFED MUSHROOMS

Source: Gourmet Inspirations Cookbook by Patti Lynch.

These mushrooms will make an excellent choice for a dairy breaking of the fast for Yom Kippur.

They're simply delicious!

1 tsp. oil
1 tbsp. dry minced onion
6 ounces fat-free cream cheese, softened
3 tbsp. freshly grated parmesan cheese

Remove stems from mushrooms; set aside. Saute mushroom caps in 1 tsp. oil for 3 minutes. Remove caps and set on a tray. Mushrooms have a lot of water, so you may have to dry them slightly with a paper towel.

Chop mushroom stems and saute them in remaining oil and juice from mushrooms.

Add minced onion and cook until mixture is soft and golden. Remove from heat.

Stir in cream cheese and Parmesan. Fill each mushroom with a small spoonful of mixture. Place mushrooms on a heavy baking sheet and broil until filling is hot and bubbling.

Cool slightly before serving. Makes 18.

Per serving (3 mushrooms): 70 cal., 2 g fat, 5 g carb., 7 g protein, 7 mg chol., 230 mg sodium. Dietary exchanges: 1 lean meat; 1 free food.

POTATO KUGEL

Source: Gourmet Inspirations by Patti Lynch

You can make individual kugels in muffin tins.

3 tbsp. finely chopped onion
½ tsp. oil
2¼ cup grated potato
2 egg yolks
4 egg whites
⅓ cup matzah meal
3 tbsp. oil
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

In large skillet, saute onion in ½ tsp. oil until transparent. In strainer or colander, rinse grated potato thoroughly under cold water. In a large bowl, combine potatoes, onion, egg yolks, matzah meal, oil and spices.

In separate bowl, beat egg whites until stiff, then fold into potato mixture.

Spray a 9x13-inch glass baking dish with nonstick coating. Pour

CHALLAH

Source: Gourmet Inspirations by Patti Lynch

A new twist on a recipe that has been a favorite for years. The orange flavor adds a spark!

1 cup warm water
3 packets dry yeast
1 cup orange juice
1 tbsp. butter or margarine, melted
1 tbsp. oil
⅔ cup fruit sweetener (use ⅔ cup frozen apple juice concentrate plus ⅓ cup granulated fructose available at most health food stores)
½ tsp. salt
2 tsp. freshly grated orange rind
1 egg plus 2 egg whites
7 cups unbleached flour
2 tbsp. fresh orange rind or sesame seeds for topping

In a small bowl, combine warm water and yeast. Blend together and set aside.

In a large bowl, combine next six ingredients, mixing until well combined. Add yeast mixture and blend well.

Beat in egg and egg whites. Add flour, ½ at a time, mixing well after each addition. Place dough on a floured board and knead for about 3 to 5 minutes, adding flour if necessary to keep dough from being sticky. Continue kneading until no longer sticky.

Wash and dry mixing bowl and coat with ½ tsp. oil. Place dough into bowl, cover with towel, and let rise one hour. Punch down and let rise one additional hour.

Divide dough in half. Divide each portion into thirds and roll into three strips and braid together. Place on a greased heavy baking sheet. Repeat with second half of dough. Sprinkle top of each loaf with orange rind or sesame seeds. Cover and let rise until double. Preheat oven to 350. Bake for 25 to 30 minutes, or until golden brown. Makes 2 challahs. Each loaf yields 16 slices.

Per slice: 128 cal., 1 g fat, 25 g carb., 4 g protein, 7 mg chol., 43 mg sodium.

Dietary exchanges: ¾ starch.

TSIMMIS

Source: Gourmet Inspirations by Patti Lynch

A spicy holiday treat that is filled with healthy ingredients.

2 yams, peeled, sliced very thin (2 cups)
4 carrots, peeled and thinly sliced
2 apples, cored, peeled and finely chopped
½ cup chopped prunes

¼ cup currants
⅓ cup toasted chopped almonds
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. ground cloves
¼ tsp. nutmeg
¼ tsp. salt
⅓ cup orange juice
2 tbsp. toasted chopped almonds

Steam yam and carrot slices for 5 minutes.

In a large bowl, combine all ingredients except juice and 2 tbsp. almonds. Pour mixture into a lightly oiled 2 to 3 quart glass baking or souffle dish. Pour orange juice over mixture and top with remaining almonds.

Bake 30 to 40 minutes at 350. Makes 8 servings.

Per (¼ cup) serving: 170 cal., 4 g fat, 33 g carb., 3 g protein, 0 mg chol., 84 mg sodium.

Dietary exchanges: 2 fruit; 1 fat.

YUMMY CHOCOLATE CUPCAKES

Source: The Diabetic Goodie Book by Kathy Kochan.

¼ cup whole-wheat flour
¼ cup all-purpose flour
½ cup sugar
½ cup cocoa powder
1 tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
¼ cup orange juice
3 tbsp. light olive or canola oil
1 tbsp. white vinegar
1 tsp. vanilla
½ cup water
½ cup mini-chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 375. Spray muffin pan with cooking spray or line with paper liners.

In a large bowl, combine flours, sugar, cocoa, baking soda and salt. Make a well in center and add orange juice, oil, vinegar, vanilla and water. Stir just to moisten. Add chips and mix gently to combine.

Spoon into prepared pan and bake about 15 minutes or until pick inserted in center comes out clean.

Immediately remove cupcakes from pan and cook completely on rack. Makes 12 regular-size cupcakes.

Per cupcake: 155 cal., 5 g fat, 26 g carb., 0 mg chol., 141 mg sodium, 2 g protein, 3 g fiber.

Exchanges: 1½ starch, 1 fat. (2 carb. choices).

The Potato Plan is exciting to read and teaches valuable life lessons

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

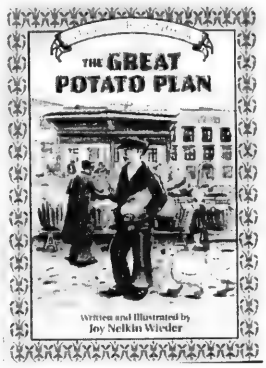
How would you feel if your father had moved to another country far away, it was wartime, and you were responsible for your mother and younger brothers and sisters?

Would you be scared? Would you know what to do?

That's the situation of 13-year-old Simcha in the book The Great Potato Plan, by Joy Nelkin Wieder (Hachai Publishers, 1999). His father and older sister were already in America, and the family members still in Poland were waiting to join them.

At the beginning of the book, the father had finally been able to send the family tickets to come to America, and Simcha and his five brothers and sisters were helping their mother pack up the household.

Two days before they were to leave, Germany and Poland, and soon the rest of the world, were at war, and all passenger travel was banned.



The family was left with very little money. They were always cold and hungry. Also, they were always afraid of the Cossacks, a military group who enjoyed beating up Jews and used to kidnap young men and boys to serve in the Russian army.

Simcha had an idea. He really loved his mother's cooking – especially her potato and onion kugel. When he earned a little bit of money, he bought potatoes and persuaded his mother and sisters to bake kugel, which he took to the market and sold by the piece. He did very well. After all, he felt, "Who could resist a hot piece of potato kugel on a freezing cold day?"

The experience taught him more than how to be a good potato kugel salesman. He learned that it isn't enough to look after your own family – you have to be kind to those who have even less. He also learned that sometimes you have to take a stand against people who want to hurt you.

The Great Potato Plan is based on the true story of Joy Nelkin Wieder's family, and shows how proud we should be of those who had such a hard time in days past.

Alois Brunner played key logistic role

Eichmann aide may face trial in France

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON – French prosecutors are expected this week to indict Alois Brunner, who played a key logistical role in the Holocaust, on charges of crimes against humanity.

Brunner, 87, was private secretary to Adolf Eichmann, chief engineer of the Holocaust, who was tried and executed in Israel in 1961.

Brunner, whose trial is expected to begin next year, is considered to have been responsible for deporting some 130,000 European Jews to their deaths in Nazi concentration camps during World War II.

The French government is exerting intense pressure on the Syrian government to extradite Brunner from his safe haven in suburban Damascus, where he lives under the pseudonym Georg Fisher.

Brunner is said to be easily identifiable because he lost an eye and several fingers in letter bombs allegedly sent to him in Syria by Israel's intelligence services.

Previous attempts to persuade Syria to release Brunner failed. Germany applied for his extradition in 1987, and in 1991 the European parliament voted to condemn Syria for continuing to harbor the alleged war criminal.

French sources say that even if Syrian President Hafez Assad rejects the personal appeal of French President Jacques Chirac for Brunner's extradition, the trial will go ahead in his absence.

The central charges against Brunner will focus on two specific incidents:

- The deportation of 250 French Jewish children to Auschwitz on July 31, 1944.
- An incident on Aug. 17, 1944, when 51 hostages, including French aircraft manufacturer Serge Dassault, were forced to accompany Brunner on the last deportation train from Paris to Germany. After cutting their way out of a cattle wagon, 27 escaped. Some of the others were gassed or died in medical experiments.

The decision by the state prosecutor comes 13 years after Nazi-hunting French lawyer Serge Klarsfeld launched a private prosecution against Brunner, who was responsible for the deportation and death of Klarsfeld's father.

Brunner was born in Austria in 1912 and joined the Austrian Nazi Party in 1931 at the age of 19. His anti-Semitism was considered to be so extreme that he was swiftly tapped to be Eichmann's private secretary.

As head of the Nazis' Jewish Affairs Office in pre-war Vienna, he organized persecution that forced thousands of Jews to flee to other European countries and the United States.

When World War II started, he sent 47,000 Austrian Jews to concentration camps.

After organizing mass round-ups in Berlin, he transferred to Greece, where he was responsible for deporting all 43,000 Jews in Salonika within just two months.

In June 1943, he was sent to France to take over the Drancy transit camp near Paris from its French administrators.

During 14 months in France, Brunner sent an estimated 25,000 men, women and children to their deaths.

The Brunner trial is being seen as the climax to France's belated, painful attempt to come to terms with its role in the Holocaust.

Brunner's prosecution will follow the trials of Klaus Barbie, Paul Touvier and Maurice Papon, all convicted in French courts of crimes against humanity.

Dagestan's Jews fear Islamic rebels

Dagestan, located on the Caspian Sea in the Caucasus region, is a part of Russia. The region borders the breakaway republic of Chechnya, whose drive for independence led to the 20-month war with Russia in 1994-96.

Although Chechen officials say they are not involved in the latest crisis, the Dagestani rebels are led by Chechen warlords whose influence is based on military experience gained during the war with Moscow.

According to news reports, Chechen warlords and leaders, including President Aslan Maskhadov, have repeatedly alleged that the region is the victim of an international conspiracy in which "Zionists" and Israel play a crucial role.

Rebels allege 'Zionist' and Israeli conspiracy

Earlier this month, the rebels in Dagestan declared a jihad, or holy war, on Russia and seized several isolated mountain villages in Dagestan.

Russian commanders this week said that their military operations had been successful and that Chechen warlords had withdrawn their fighters from the last villages they had occupied. But officials in Moscow said dozens of rebels were still trapped in the villages, and Russian troops would destroy the insurgency this week.

Because most of Dagestan's 5,000 Jews live in a different part of the republic, they have not been affected directly by the fighting.

Yet members of the Jewish community have expressed fear for their safety and there has been a rise in Jewish emigration.

According to Alla Levy, the Moscow-based director of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Russian office, emigration to Israel from Dagestan has increased this year.

During the first half of this year, between 60 and 70 Jews left for Israel each month. Levy said the figures will increase dramatically as a result of the current crisis.

"We are not panicking, but the situation is very serious," a Jewish leader, who did not want his name to be published, said in a phone interview from the Dagestani capital of Makhachkala.

He said the rise of Islamic fundamentalism has not affected Jewish life yet, but fears it may ultimately threaten Jewish existence in the area.

"Today all this talk about jihad has nothing to do with us, but who can tell what will happen tomorrow?"

The rebels' Web site says that non-Muslims would be allowed to live in a Dagestan ruled by Islamic law. However, Christians and Jews would have to pay a special tax.

Almost 95 percent of Dagestan's 2 million people are Muslims.

Dagestan's is one of the oldest Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union, tracing its history back at least 12 centuries.

But recent years have seen a wave of aliyah because of economic hardships and a steep rise in crime. Almost 90 percent of Dagestan's Jewish population has left since the fall of the Soviet Union.

Israel to fight Diaspora anti-Semitism

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Israel is prepared to combat Anti-Semitism in the Diaspora, an Israeli cabinet member said recently.

During a global video-conference call on combatting anti-Semitism, Michael Melchior, minister in the Prime Minister's Office said, "We can assist in the fight against anti-Semitism. We have expertise in Israel."

Melchior, who is responsible for Diaspora affairs, was speaking to Rabbi Matt Friedman of Congregation Beth Shalom, one of three Sacramento synagogues torched in June.

Melchior and MK Naomi Blumenthal, chair of the Knesset Immigration, Absorption and Diaspora Affairs committee, discussed fighting anti-Semitism during the video-conference call with representatives of the Jewish communities in Rio de Janeiro, Miami, and Sacramento.

"Just like anti-Semites have no borders, I believe we in the fight against anti-Semitism should have no borders," Melchior told Friedman.

Minister in the prime minister's office Michael Malchior, who is responsible for Diaspora affairs, held a video conference with representatives of Jewish communities on combatting anti-Semitism.

"There's no answer to it, but we know it's a major threat," Melchior said. "We have to get to it with education and legislation."

He and Blumenthal, together with a group of the Israeli press, spoke with the Jewish communities in other areas, including Montreal, in a video conference set up by Talk Visual, an international video-calling company. This discussion inaugurated Talk Visual's Tel Aviv office.

After the arson attacks on the three Sacramento synagogues in June, Talk Visual's chairman Michael Zwebner wanted to find a way to help the Jewish community. Zwebner said, "Our new video-calling Talk Visual location...in Sacramento, provides people with a way to perpetuate love and care, and we are appalled at the racial and religious violence in our newly adopted community."

His company offered a $10,000 cash reward for information leading to the arrests and conviction of the perpetrators of the arson attacks.

When police arrested Matthew and Taylor Williams on another charge, they found a hit list which included Zwebner's name for offering a reward for their arrest.

"The purpose of our company is to link people," Gene Rosov, CEO and president of Talk Visual said, explaining that the company decided to organize this video conference to help reduce the Sacramento Jewish community's "sense of isolation."

Twelve cities around the world were invited to take part in the video conference.

Asked which countries face the most anti-Semitism today, Melchior said it's an "illusion to think we're talking about a certain country. [Anti-Semitism] is a common threat against any kind of society. Democracy and anti-Semitism don't go together."

After sharing how his community felt as a result of the attacks, Melchior told Friedman. "I hope [your] Jewish community will stand strong and not let haters decide our agenda. We feel as one community with you."

Blumenthal added that it is vital to "pressure the U.S. to teach kids about anti-Semitism and what came out of it."

As for why Video Talk set up this conference call at no charge to the Jewish communities taking part, Rosov said, "We feel responsible to the Jewish community for a variety of reasons ...Racism is an important purpose."

Melchior agreed. "While anti-Semitism begins with Jews, it doesn't end with Jews. It always continues to other groups," he said. "There's no answer to it, but we know it's a major threat."

Blumenthal said she was excited to take part in the conference and noted that she had participated in similar conferences with the Australian Jewish community about the Maccabiah bridge disaster.

"They feel better seeing our faces," she said, as a reason why video-conferencing is better than a telephone conference call.

"We want to show them that we're human and that it was a tragedy. They can see our sympathetic faces."

Rosov said Talk Visual has plans to open a Jerusalem location in the next two months. He said there are already two outlets in Canada – one in Toronto and one in Montreal – and a third, in Vancouver, will open soon.

Whereas the average video-conference call at other outlets costs upwards of $900 (US), Talk Visual uses a networking system that keeps costs affordable, approximately $100 an hour.

"Our mission is to link people around the world," Rosov said.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 23

• A new border crossing between Israel and Jordan, funded by Japan, was inaugurated. Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy said the Hussein Bridge would strengthen ties between the two countries, while his Jordanian counterpart stressed the need for Israel and the Palestinians to move forward in their negotiations.

Aug. 24

• Agreements between Israel and the PA on safe-passage routes between the West Bank and Gaza Strip and on a seaport in Gaza depend upon the two sides resolving other disputes, according to sources in Israel's Prime Minister's Office.

• A mall that is touted as the largest shopping centre in the Middle East opened in Haifa. The Grand Canyon has 170 stores and parking for 3,000 cars.

Aug. 25

• Foreign Minister David Levy is dispatching envoys to Arab countries to present Israel's position in peace talks. The ministry officials are traveling to Morocco, Mauritania, Tunisia and the Gulf Arab states.

• Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein defended a plea bargain reached in the case of American teenager Samuel Sheinbein, who fled to Israel after a 1997 murder in suburban Maryland. The plea bargain, in which Sheinbein will receive a 24-year prison sentence, is extremely harsh by Israeli standards.

Aug. 26

• The Palestinian Authority (PA) invited rival groups, including militant Islamic groups, to participate in unity talks in the West Bank in the upcoming week. PA Chairman Yasser Arafat is trying to build a unity front in advance of possible final-status talks with Israel.

Aug. 27

• Israel prevented a Palestinian attempt to get a foreign vessel to visit Gaza. The Palestinians were trying to establish Gaza's status as an international harbor.

Serious flashpoints exist on the road to peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

So near and yet so far. Last week, Israel and the Palestinian Authority appeared to be moving inexorably toward implementing the Wye memorandum, which Benjamin Netanyahu froze 10 months ago after only the first phase.

By this week, a deal was in jeopardy, threatened by differences over the release of Palestinian prisoners and the timing of final status negotiations.

Before the latest crisis erupted, the talks had been on a roller-coaster course. Yasser Arafat had accused Israel of breach of trust, while Ehud Barak had charged the Palestinian Authority with inflexibility. But then, suddenly, the two sides edged close to a breakthrough.

This is the way the situation looked in the middle of last week. A timetable for Israel's next two withdrawals was at hand. The first pullout was expected to take place in October, and the second in January. On Oct. 1, the first of two safe passage routes from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank were to be opened and construction of a seaport in Gaza was to commence. These provisions of the Olso accord were long overdue.

In another confidence-building measure, Israel had reopened Hebron's main thoroughfare, shut in the wake of Baruch Goldstein's murderous rampage in 1994. The massacre claimed the lives of 29 Palestinians and touched off a series of deadly suicide bombings which almost derailed the Oslo peace process.

As a result of these developments, the mood around the negotiating table lightened considerably. The Palestinians' chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat, said that Israel was serious about peace. His Israeli counterpart, Gilad Sher, declared, "I believe we have built a relationship of mutual respect and trust."

It didn't seem so just a few weeks earlier, when Barak was talking about renegotiating Wye and the Palestinians were resisting his suggestion and archly implying that he was virtually indistinguishable from Netanyahu.

If Wye is finally implemented, Israel will evacuate a further 11 percent of the West Bank, and the Palestinians will crack down on terrorism and incitement, seize illegal weapons and trim the size of their security forces. Permanent status talks will focus on the most contentious issues – final borders, a Palestinian state, settlements, Jerusalem, Arab refugees and water.

If Wye becomes a fait accompli, the Palestinians will be in full or partial control of a disconnected patchwork of territory consisting of 40 percent of the West Bank and practically its entire Arab population. They are demanding much more – about 90 percent of the West Bank in contiguous form, the eastern part of Jerusalem, which Israel annexed in 1967, and an end to all unilateral actions.

Barak, a staunch centrist whose policies and pronouncements fall to the left of Netanyahu but to the right of his late mentor, Yitzhak Rabin, seems intent on fulfilling Israel's Wye obligations to the letter. But the Palestinians are disappointed with him.

In line with his belief that Jerusalem is non-negotiable, Barak has not halted construction at Har Choma. In 1997, when Netanyahu announced that this massive housing estate in eastern Jerusalem would be built, the Palestinians pulled out of the peace talks.

Barak has also allowed building to continue at a smaller apartment complex in Ras al-Amud, which is also in east Jerusalem.

Barak's policy on settlements in the territories is remarkably similar to Netanyahu's.

In line with assurances conveyed to the National Religious Party, he is permitting existing settlements to expand. He has not cancelled special tax breaks enjoyed by Jewish settlers, nor has he rescinded the previous government's edict to connect Maale Adumim – the largest settlement in the West Bank – to Jerusalem. Furthermore, he has not dismantled more than 30 illegal encampments erected by settlers since the Wye agreement was signed in October 1998.

It's clear that there are serious flashpoints along the road to peace.

Storm erupts over comments by the late French president

Ha'artetz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — A leading French writer stirred up a storm of controversy yesterday by saying the late President Francois Mitterrand had once complained to him about "the powerful and noxious influence of the Jewish lobby in France."

Jean d'Ormesson, a member of the prestigious Academie Francaise, reported in his latest book, The Gabriel Report, that Mitterrand had made the remark in a conversation on May 17, 1995, the last day of his 14-year presidency.

The writer's move drew criticism from Mitterrand's illegitimate daughter, and denials from Prime Minister Lionel Jospin and other fellow Socialists. But there were also statements supporting d'Ormesson.

In excerpts published in the weekly Le Nouvel Observateur, d'Ormesson said he had asked Mitterrand about his longtime friendship with pro-Nazi wartime police chief Rene Bosquet. This friendship had tarnished the Socialist leader's image late in his life.

"Francois Mitterrand listened to me without any apparent irritation and looked at me. 'Here you see,' he said, 'the powerful and noxious influence of the Jewish lobby in France,'" d'Ormesson wrote.

Mitterrand, who died in 1996, also saw his reputation dented late in his life by revelations that he had worked for the collaborationist Vichy regime before joining the wartime resistance.

Under the Vichy regime, 75,000 Jews were sent from France to Nazi death camps.

France's current Jewish community, numbering about 750,000, is the largest in western Europe.

Mitterrand's illegitimate daughter Mazarine Pingeot denounced d'Ormesson for slandering a dead man and defended her father as a crusader against anti-Semitism.

"I'm ashamed to have to ask the question, but did he ever, even once, betray his commitments to the Jewish community or any other community under threat?" she wrote in the daily Le Monde.

Jospin, a Socialist who sometimes differed with Mitterrand, said he had several long discussions with the president about the French Jewish community and the situation of Jews around the world.

"In his thoughts and in his emotions, anti-Semitism was foreign to Francois Mitterrand," Jospin said in a statement. A Mitterrand ally, former culture minister Jack Lang, suggested to Le Monde that d'Ormesson might not have remembered that final meeting accurately.

But a friend of Mitterrand and d'Ormesson, journalist Jean Daniel, confirmed that the former president had sometimes complained about a "Zionist lobby," but he added that this did not make him an anti-Semite.

Israelis build a better battery

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Prepare for a new breed of battery-powered bunnies.

Researchers at the Technion – the Israel Institute of Technology have developed a high-energy "super-iron" battery that delivers power for longer periods and is more environmentally friendly than alkaline batteries.

According to the Haifa-based institute, some 60 billion batteries are used around the globe each year, with much of today's demand coming from "high-drain electronics," such as laptop computers and cellular phones.

Their new class of batteries is made of an uncommon form of iron combined with oxygen, called ferrate, and can store 50 percent more energy than conventional batteries of comparable size.

Jews and Israelis in global money-laundering probe

By ISABELLA GINOR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Several Jews, including some with Israeli citizenship, have been questioned in connection with a worldwide probe into an alleged money-laundering operation.

In what may be the biggest such case in history, investigators are trying to find out whether Russian mobsters funneled billions of dollars through accounts at the Bank of New York.

One central figure in the story, the man apparently responsible for disclosing the names of 23 senior Kremlin officials with 32 accounts in Swiss banks, is Felipe Turover, a Jew "of Spanish origin," born in the Soviet Union, who went to the west in 1983 and currently holds Israeli and Spanish citizenship.

When the Soviet Union disintegrated, Turover returned there and was employed by western lenders to collect Soviet debts. One of his employers was Banca del Gottardo of Lugano, Switzerland.

After a disagreement with the bank's local representative and, he says, threats on his life, Turover went to the Swiss state prosecution to report on the accounts. He also revealed that, using the accounts, bribes had been paid by the construction firm Mabetex to senior Kremlin officials, in connection with contracts for the renovation of Kremlin buildings.

The Swiss are also investigating the financial dealings of two companies associated with the Russian national carrier, Aeroflot-Andava and Forus Services. The Swiss suspect that the companies used the airline to transfer money to private bank accounts abroad.

Among those said to have profited from the bank accounts and the bribes from Mabetex are President Boris Yeltsin, his wife Naina, their daughters Tatyana and Yelena, and Yelena's husband, Valery Okulov, the managing director of Aeroflot.

The Bank of New York last Friday dismissed Lucy Edwards, one of two employees it had put on leave until the probe ends. She was fired for violations of the bank's internal policies, falsification of bank records and failure to cooperate, said a source familiar with the situation. Edwards worked in the bank's London office in its eastern European division for Natasha Gurfinkel Kagalovsky, who also was placed on leave until the close of the investigation.

Edwards is married to Peter Berlin, who is linked to a company called Benex, which set up funds transfer accounts at the Bank of New York.

Gurfinkel Kagalovsky, a senior vice-president and head of the bank's eastern European division, maintained her innocence last week. A statement from her lawyer said that neither she nor her husband, Konstantin Kagalovsky, formerly Russia's representative to the International Monetary Fund, was ever involved in money laundering.

Gurfinkel and Kagalovsky married only a few years ago, after she was already working for The Bank of New York.

Israel must not be defensive at the UN, says ambassador

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israel should stop being so defensive at the United Nations, according to the country's new ambassador to the world body.

"I think the defensive approach was derived primarily from Israel's standing in the region," Yehuda Lankri told Israel Radio last Sunday.

"But for more than two decades, we have been on the threshold of the peace process – and we have to exploit this new status to try to move from a defensive approach to one of more openness towards the family of nations."

Last Sunday, the cabinet approved the appointment of Lankri, a former Knesset member and ambassador to France. The Moroccan-born Lankri, 51, is considered close to Foreign Minister David Levy and has served in the Israeli parliament as a member of his Gesher movement.

Lankri's remarks came as Israel readies for possible diplomatic confrontations at the upcoming U.N. General Assembly, where the Palestinians hope to see a number of anti-Israel resolutions approved.

Levy has directed Israel's missions abroad to try to thwart these efforts.

At last Sunday's cabinet meeting, he protested that the Palestinians negotiate with Israel on the one hand and try to put pressure on Israel and turn international opinion against it on the other.

Lankri said Israel should try to get beyond stamping out diplomatic brush fires in the United Nations.

"We must focus our energies and creative efforts on advancing central issues and not get bogged down in marginal ones," he said.

He added that he believes Israel could be more involved in U.N. activities, especially in the area of humanitarian work.

Two Torontonians awarded academic gold medals

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Torontonians who became friends through their involvement with the University of Western Ontario's Jewish Students' Union (JSU) were awarded gold medals by Western for academic achievement, on their recent graduation.

Elise Pulver, 22, and Tamara Glick, 23, received their medals with their three-year and four-year BAs, respectively.

Pulver will enter law school at Western this year.

Glick, who would like to pursue graduate studies, is taking a year off to work, in the hope of financing future travels and to decide what academic direction she would like to take for her master's degree.

Both received the highest grade average of the graduating classes of their respective programs, and both have strong backgrounds in Reform Judaism, having pursued Jewish studies until their confirmations – Pulver at Holy Blossom Temple, and Glick at Temple Har Zion.

Elise Pulver

Tamara Glick

Both have also written for Western's Jewish student publication, Grape Juice.

Pulver – whose many extracurricular activities include a stint as a ski instructor in Whistler, B.C. – was happy and surprised to discover she'd won the gold medal.

"I look up to so many people in my classes," said the Comparative Literature and Civilization major.

A graduate of York Mills Collegiate Institute, Pulver worked for a London law firm during her second year at Western. The experience, which included many hours in the library researching a major case, strengthened her conviction that law was the field for her.

Her involvement with the JSU, where she was an executive member, provided Pulver with "another family away from home," she said.

She – and Glick – were also members of the Order of Omega Honorary Society, which recognizes community service and academic performance. Pulver served as its vice-president last year.

Glick, a former JSU gender issues chair, majored in Women's Studies and English. She is considering a career in either journalism or academia. Most of her undergraduate research dealt with the position of women in Judaism, she said.

It was "very exciting" for her to receive the gold medal.

Although she pulled all-nighters as a first-year student, it "wasn't my best method," she said. "I tried not to do it."

A graduate of Thornlea Secondary School, Glick said, "It's not a matter of being the best in the class. It's a matter of making sure I achieve the level I know I'm capable of."

Interestingly, as her extracurricular life got busier with JSU, sorority and salsa dancing, her grades – which were undoubtedly respectable to begin with – soared.

"For me, study should always be a part of your life," said Glick. "I love it."

Lost weight equals new found love of shopping

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When it comes to shopping for clothes Shirley Kellerstein is like a kid in a candy store.

And who can blame her? After losing 60 pounds in the last year, Kellerstein, 47, says trying on new clothes is so much fun these days.

"Before I couldn't go into a regular store. I had to go to plus size stores or the plus-size section of the department stores...It's no fun to go shopping when you know nothing looks good on you.

"Now I'll walk through the mall and if I see sales signs, I can go in and try on the clothes and see what they have."

Kellerstein was one of three women who spoke about how enjoyable the experience of shopping has become for them since they lost weight.

"I had lost a lot of weight before my 40th birthday when I was in my late 30s. That was the last time I enjoyed shopping," she said.

The mother of two boys, aged 10 and 12, Kellerstein said her pregnancies were not the major cause of her weight gain.

"I had put on weight during my pregnancies, but I can't blame it on that per se. There were many factors, like quitting smoking and eating out a lot before the kids were born."

By June of last year, Kellerstein had ballooned to 205 pounds, and knowing that her son Aaron's bar mitzvah was coming up in November 1999, she said it was time to take action.

"That was a huge incentive. I had decided a year ago the end of June I would start losing weight. I thought even if I lost only five pounds a month, I would have plenty of time before Aaron's bar mitzvah."

She lost 20 pounds over the summer, she said. "I didn't follow any program – just a low fat diet. By the time the high holidays started I lost incentive."

She didn't lose much weight from then until January, but when she saw how much weight her friend had lost on Weight Watchers, Kellerstein joined the program.

By following the Weight Watchers diet and exercising four to five times a week – Kellerstein said she forced herself to use a 7-year-old Nordic track ski machine four to five times a week – she managed to lose another 40 pounds by the summer.

Shirley Kellerstein is like a kid in a candy store after losing weight.

Like Kellerstein, Cindy Saltzman said the up-coming bar mitzvah of her oldest son – the simchah took place in June – was the incentive for her to take off 30 pounds.

"I just wanted to look good in the pictures and video. I was tired of looking at myself in pictures and feeling embarrassed."

Saltzman, 37, the mother of three boys, aged 13, seven, and eight, said she has been overweight most of her life.

"I never dieted. I always felt comfortable with myself until I saw pictures. I did this [diet] with my mother. We are the same size. We saw ourselves in family pictures. I looked at the picture and I said 'Oh my God!'"

Saltzman also joined Weight Watchers to shed the extra weight.

"I'm not skinny," she said, "but I feel a huge difference, I feel great."

As for buying clothes now that she is thinner, she said, "It's amazing...I can go into any store."

Before she lost the weight, Saltzman, who runs a home-based business teaching and selling needlepoint, said she shopped at a special boutique on Eglinton Avenue and at her cousin's home-based clothing store.

"I could never buy any pants from [my cousin]. By the summer, I could fit into all her pants."

"I have jeans that were too small that fit now," she added.

She said she rarely wore jeans before. "I always wore leggings and oversized shirts and vests to cover up most of me. I never tucked in anything. I would never wear shorts. I wore leggings with T-shirts and long dresses down to my ankle."

Like Saltzman, Kellerstein said she used to buy mainly oversized tops, and pants with elasticized waists, and she, too, never tucked in her tops.

Saltzman, who went from a size 16 to a 12, recalled one of her first shopping experiences after her weight loss.

"I tried on a pair of capri pants at my cousin's. She said they fit small. She said, 'Don't feel badly if they don't fit.'[But] they fit. I bought them in two colors. I bought body suits and a short sweater.

"I also bought a suit with a short jacket and skirt. I never wore a short skirt before. It was great."

And there were plenty of new outfits in more fitted styles for the bar mitzvah, which took place June 19. It was entire weekend affair, Saltzman said. "The whole weekend we had parties day and night."

On the Friday evening, she wore

Losing weight puts the fun back into clothes shopping

long pants – a white and light blue hound's-tooth pattern – paired with a white sleeveless body suit and white short sleeve sweater, and yes, her guests noticed the change, she said. "I got a lot of compliments."

For the shul service, she wore a short navy leather skirt – she had it made – with a Chanel-type jacket trimmed in leather, she said.

"I wanted to wear something different. We started in March to choose [the outfit]. It was finished one week before the bar mitzvah.

"My mother also lost 30 pounds. Our outfits were made together."

For the Sunday night party, she wore a black gown with a chiffon skirt attached to a body suit worn with a beaded T-shirt over it. "This is a style I would never have worn had I not lost the weight," Saltzman said. "I felt great."

After her 15-pound weight loss Sharron Lungen, 35, another Weight Watchers' success story, can also wear certain styles that she said would not have suited her when she was heavier.

"I wasn't really that heavy," she said. But "I thought I would feel more comfortable if I dropped the weight I put on since my wedding [in 1996]."

And when she had to buy a new dressy outfit for a wedding this spring, Lungen said she chose "a really slinky dress, which I would not have been caught dead in before I lost the weight."

She said she felt really good in this dress, which she described as a simple black velour shift that follows the shape of the body, with a tube-style bodice.

Another dress, she said she would not have worn before her weight loss was a gift from her mother-in-law.

The long pale blue dress with two slits in the front up to the mid-leg has buttons down the front and a drawstring in the back.

"It's a gorgeous dress. It's perfect for the office," she said. "It would not have fit me if I had not lost the weight."

She said she has also purchased a short denim skirt – a style that was off-limits during her heavier phase; and now she can feel comfortable wearing a simple T-shirt and jeans

Working in the financial services industry, Lungen needs to be dressed up for work, she said. "I always wear suits and dresses. I started my job last September. Shortly after I started, I felt the tightness [in my clothes] as I began gaining weight."

With the weight loss, the clothes started to feel comfortable again, she said.

She said one of the nicest things about the weight loss is not having to spend as much time figuring out what to wear.

"Now I don't have think or plan so much around clothes. Whatever I put on these days is OK. I don't have to worry about finding the outfit that flatters me. Most things fit nicely."

Lungen now wears clothing in size 8 to 10, and being in that size range, she said, makes it easier to find clothing when she shops

"It's definitely helped me walk out of store with something new. It has made shopping easier. It's easier to find stuff that looks nice."

Kellerstein said she found shopping for clothes in May for two family bar mitzvahs in June was exciting.

"I knew I needed a nice cocktail dress. I went straight to the fancy clothes rack and I picked a little black dress off the rack. I tried it on. The zipper did up. It was still obviously tight, but I bought it anyway. By the time the bar mitzvah in June came along, it fit me perfectly.

"It was an incentive. That was my first time dressing up since I lost the weight. It felt fabulous."

She said for the second bar mitzvah, she was able to fit into a suit she bought when she was 40. "It was great, except I was the only one wearing a red suit. Everyone else was wearing pastel."

So far nobody has not recognized her, but she said "people do double takes when they see you."

While "it's more fun to go shopping" and her wardrobe has increased substantially, Kellerstein said there are other benefits to the weight loss.

"Looking better, feeling better and watching the scale go down is a reward in itself. And the nice clothes are the icing on the cake."

And Lungen stressed that while it's gratifying to lose weight, the benefits to her health outweigh the advantages of shopping and looking better.

"It's easier walking, breathing. Everything is a little lighter. It's all about taking care of your body and keeping it healthy so you don't get diseases like diabetes."

TONI PLUS FALL FASHIONS

The Fall '99 season celebrates the move forward into the new millennium with a feeling of opulence and sophistication. Among the lines Toni Plus (sizes 14-22) carries at its three stores in Ontario and one in Alberta are Brian Bailey, Anne Klein, Nygard, Ellen Fisher, Dana Buchman, Votre Nom, Ellen Tracy and this sport line from Jones featuring a woodland green corduroy barn jacket, a flannel plaid shirt and a cranapple funnel neck top.

Woman's autobiography geared towards the fashion lover in us

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

Love, Loss and What I Wore (Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill) is an autobiography with a twist. It's a picture book for grown ups – mainly female grown ups.

Written and illustrated by Ilene Beckerman, this small hard cover book is geared to fashion aficionados. Beckerman tells the story of her life through the clothes she wore.

Essentially we follow her through the various stages in her life from the age of seven. She chronicles ordinary events — birthdays, ballet classes and school events – and milestones like weddings and divorces.

Included with each page of text are illustrations of the clothes she wore on those occasions, such as the plaid taffeta dress her mother made her for her 10th birthday.

In many respects, Beckerman, 65, has led a fairly ordinary life. She grew up in New York City. The mother of five and a grandmother, Beckerman, twice married and divorced, went to work outside the home at the age of 38. Today she's a vice-president of an advertising agency.

But we don't learn much about the transition she made from housewife to single career woman. Indeed, the biography is a thumbnail sketch of Beckerman's life using illustrations of her clothes and fashion trends of the times.

The book harks back to another era — casual Fridays would

200 percent sexy

Girls just wanna' have fun the theme for fall's beauty tips

Girls just want to have fun is the theme for Fall '99. Gypsy chic is back with a vengeance. The shades are bright and gorgeous, the mood 200 percent sexy; and if that isn't enough, rocker eye-liners swing dance into the new millennium.

Brows are meticulously shaped and fuller than ever. The most popular lip shades are varying tones of mauve and berries. Brown lips are total history, so kiss them goodbye. Although lip liner is not supposed to be predominant, it is still essential for lip definition.

Begin to use more richly formulated cremes to keep skin soft and prevent dryness. The cool winds and heating systems will no doubt dehydrate your skin. Don't forget to exfoliate weekly to remove the barrier of dead skin cells to allow cremes to penetrate more effectively.

Don't give up your exercise regime just yet. Fall fashions are very fitted and feminine. Continue your low fat, low sugar diet and drink a lot of water. If you are concerned about puffiness, eat your carbs for lunch, and protein and veggies for dinner. According to the new Suzanne Somers diet, stay away from all white flour and sugar. Keeping fit is being healthy, and that folks, is the essence of beauty.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Precision, with a do-it-yourself skin-analyzing computer, is Chanel's latest technological breakthrough. This line of unique cremes combines beauty and science to address many skin types, focusing on photo-aging, which means loss of radiance and/or dark spots caused by passing years.

Finally, attention to our much neglected skin tone – a few lines don't look so bad on a bright complexion.

Estee Lauder's Perfectly Clean is one of the most superb cleansers I've used. It's available in pump bottles or soap form. According to Dominique Szabo (senior vice-president of product development worldwide), the solid bars are never to be referred to as "soap." These petal pink (dry/normal) and mint green (oily/normal) cleansers, whether solid, lotion or gel provide rich lather that leaves skin squeaky clean, yet soft and velvety.

"These cleansers stand up to the white towel test!" Szabo claims. I agree – bravo Estee Lauder.

Now back to wrinkles. Christian Dior has an exciting breakthrough, named Phenomena-A A double retinol (molecule derived from vitamin A), it claims that in four weeks, wrinkles are 69 percent visibly reduced, and that is the minimum result.

Check out Lancaster's Suractif line. It has a "deep lift" firming effect, as a result of their exclusive ingredient, Retinol 2. This little molecule is definitely having a comeback – and deservedly so. Its dual action has an excellent effect on and below the skin's surface. These luxurious products are contained in gorgeous gold packaging and will be available November 99.

Borghese offers us the ultimate pampering treatments. They are moisturizing and restoring gloves and socks with polymer lining (containing restorative properties) that promise to restore moisture and totally revitalize our feet and hands. For best results, sleep with them overnight. Fango Active Mud from Borghese is a mineral-enriched volcanic mud that dissolves clogged skin dirt as it exfoliates, hydrates and firms the face and body. Check out their new Botanico eye compresses, they are so soothing! Borghese is available at Holt Renfrew.

Girls just wanna' have fun

Liquid Lipstick in eight exquisite shades – just toss it in your purse and away you go.

Elizabeth Arden's Lip Lip Hooray delivers moisturizing color, SPF protection and surprise, fresh breath. The burst of mint flavor, freshens your breath with each application.

NAILS: Diorific nail enamel, of course from Christian Dior, is color shine in a bottle – exquisitely designed in a tiny transparent ball with a cute gold faceted hat – a great gift. For an interesting twist, try Dior's Matte Nail Enamel; it appears velvety soft with no shine at all.

Estee Lauder High Gloss Lacquer is just as lovely and has a UV absorber to maintain color fidelity.

Jet Set Quick Dry Enamel from L'Oreal does set in about one minute, and check out the sparkle!

Don't miss Chanel's Quick Shine and their new blue-tinged pink opalescent top coat, which is charming.

FOUNDATION: Lancaster's new Matifying Compact Treatment is a powder with a long-wearing creamy formulation. Its treatment action helps regulate sebum levels (oils) and maintain skin's moisture balance. It is ideal for a complete base, retouching and camouflage. It is definitely the must have product for all skin types prone to shine.

For fun and dazzle, apply L'Oreal's Body Makeup Highlighter to your cheeks and brows, and watch them brighten.

SWEET CHEEKS: Creme-to-Powder cheek colors from Arden's Enchantment palette delivers blendable and smooth brightness in three exciting shades.

The Shower of Stars collection from Chanel is irresistible. Eclats Cosmiques is a lip and cheek makeup offering a whole spectrum of precious lights. Its two shades of copper bronze and copper beige are dynamic.

Dior's Nude Beige is chic and perfect for that flesh-tone finish.

Check out Stila at Holt's, a hot new makeup line from New York. Shimmer your lips and cheeks with their yummy raspberry gloss.

EYE CANDY: Lancome's Passage series has an exquisite creme eye shadow that contains aqua gliss, a new technological wonder that is rich in water and has an ultra-cool texture. Dab on this silky creme and watch it evaporate into a thin film of color. Lancome formulates yet another fabulous mascara named Magnificil – it's all in the brush.

Estee Lauder's Two-In-One Eye Shadow Duo in the color Storm produces a sultry and dramatic eye.

L'Oreal's Eye Smoker Liner and Shadow Crayons are alluring and easy to apply, and they just shimmer.

Try eye shadow in a tube from Clinique. This green/gold Smudgie glides on like satin.

LUSCIOUS LIPS: Futurist Full Treatment Lipstick from Lauder's Winter Beach collection is super hydrating and helps reduce signs of premature aging.

Lancome treats us to a three lip color and two texture all-in-one compact – simply divine.

Top up your lips with Lancaster's creamy, iridescent beige – great on all shades. And make sure you see their vintage wine collection. Your lips will glisten with the lustre of ripe grapes.

Quick and easy is Clinique's new

HAIR: Salon Daniel moves to 79 Yorkville Ave. The talented artist has created a luxurious ambiance with services that include not only the finest in hair styling, but a full service spa. Hair fashion this season Daniel says, is about control with a sense of freedom.

"This translates to straight shiny hair mixed with a soft wave. Braids and crimping will be popular mixed with straight tresses," he concludes.

Extreme Anti-Snap treatment from Redken zeroes in on split ends and fortifies weak areas.

Protein Shampoo and conditioner from Kiehl's provide a natural way for your hair to shine and bounce. Try their high-gloss conditioner and styling oil for lustre without that weighted down look.

Lip augmentation is a safe, painless procedure

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

Since the days of Joan Crawford, women, young and old, have sought full, voluptuous lips. That was quite a contrast from the thin lip beauties of the '30s like Marlene Dietrich.

Psychologically, full lips seem to denote sexuality and warmth, while thin lips imply a cold and stern demeanor. Of course this is mythology: Our brain interprets visual imaging in very unique ways.

Today, surrounded by beautiful people with voluminous lips like Claudia Schiffer, Julia Roberts and just about every other celebrated beauty, it is no wonder that lip augmentation is one of the most popular cosmetic procedures done.

There are many different techniques being practised. Collagen was the most popular, but it only lasts about three to six months.

Fat injections are effective, as they actually remove fat from one part of your body and inject it into the lips. The lasting effect here is questionable, with the average time being about two to five months.

Hylaform and Restylane are quite similar, both gels being derived from hyaluronic acid (a humectant that keeps skin moist and supple) which occurs naturally in our body. It dissolves naturally with time. Both these gels last about four to eight months.

Although these methods are all quite safe and effective, the apparent glitch is that they don't last.

Dr. Sammy Sliwin of the Forest Hill Institute of Aesthetic Plastic Surgery, says the problem is that biological materials are reabsorbed within six months to a year, and synthetics, until now, can cause side effects and allergic reactions.

"Beware of charlatans still using silicone and calling it a different name, it not only migrates but it's illegal," cautions the doctor. "Creating a lasting way to smooth out wrinkles and plump up the lips has been a pursuit for decades."

Among the Toronto cognoscenti, it seems that Dr. Sheldon Pollack of Women's College Hospital, is the maven of the new miracle substance called Artecoll.

He explains that Artecoll consists of homogeneous polymethylmethacrylate (PMMA) microspheres, evenly suspended in a solution of partly denatured collagen.

He says following the injection in the lower part of the dermis, the collagen vehicle will be degraded by the body within one to three months. The microspheres will be totally encapsulated by a fine, fibrous capsule and the process will be complete after two to four months.

Since the PMMA microspheres are non-biodegradable and too large to migrate, the resulting tissue augmentation will be long lasting.

Like a miracle

Sliwin says, "The onset of Artecoll is like a miracle. It has simply taken over the market. The results are superb and the effect lasts for years. It also works incredibly well on other facial lines."

He says the whole procedure takes about 15 minutes and could be done on a lunch hour. Of course, the lips would be swollen, but if you are not working with the public there would be no down time, he adds.

Sliwin uses a topical freezing called Emla, which some doctors feel is enough, but he prefers to inject freezing along with the numbing cream to enable him to sculpt the lips so that the patient is totally pain free, he says.

"I would suggest, without a doubt, to use both freezing techniques. The lips are very sensitive and why suffer when there is no need."

A collagen test is imperative prior to the event as allergic reactions can occur. Redness and swelling are sure signs of problems. If this is the case, Restylane would be the best alternative, as it lasts the longest of the absorbables.

Dr. Michael Bederman of the Centre for Cosmetic Surgery says his office is buzzing with not only women of all ages but men as well. "People want fuller lips and Artecoll is an excellent process. It not only lasts but produces excellent results."

If you are at all hesitant, Odette Levy, director of the centre, suggests having a non-permanent procedure first.

I agree with Levy. Conservative movement toward change is always best.

Another alternative, albeit not as effective, but lots of fun, is Super Duper Lips from Joey New York. It is a two part lip product containing an all natural gel with a flesh-colored lip pencil. You massage this honey gel into your lips for seven minutes and your lips stay plumbed for up to four hours (It 's available by calling 1-800-563-9691).

So if you are young, old, male or female and you have always wanted sexy, voluminous, or just slightly enlarged lips, your time has come. There are safe methods to suit all your needs, be they temporary or longer lasting.

I asked the experts if lipstick adheres as well to a puffy lip as it does to a thin one? A unanimous Yes was said by all.

Socks 'n shirts on the 'Net

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Men's fashions have gone into cyberspace. By just clicking, you can find out what colors will be in demand this fall, and order your size and style. Within a few days, you will have the items delivered to your door.

What started as a catalogue business that sold high quality, reasonably priced, men's white cotton shirts by toll-free telephone or fax, has catapulted into an international business with a fast-growing customer base.

Five years ago, Leon Goren, a chartered accountant, Keith Beckley, a physicist, and Doug Childerhose, a banker, who regularly shopped for white cotton dress shirts which cost more than $100, decided that there was a way to save money.

"We set up 'just white shirts & black socks,' a business with a low overhead," says Goren, president of the company.

"We wanted to sell directly to our customers in the easiest way we could imagine. And we really wanted to put the value into our shirts, socks and service."

With an initial investment of $25,000, the trio soon discovered that businessmen and executives liked the convenience of ordering a reasonably priced wardrobe staple that can be delivered to their home or office in 48 hours.

The first year, sales were $100,000, and within three years it had jumped to more than $750,000. The partners worked at their day jobs and spent their nights taking orders, packing boxes for delivery, and developing a sophisticated computer database.

In 1997, Goren gave up his position at Deloitte Touche to become managing director. "The growth of the company is beyond my wildest expectations," says Goren.

That year, 'just white shirts & black socks' set up a Web site at www.justwhiteshirts.com.

"The Web has allowed us to double our sales," says Goren. He notes that there are now three operations – Canadian, American, and Australian – "and other co-marketing ventures are in the works."

He said the Internet attracts customers from such countries as Japan, France, Indonesia, Bulgaria, Cayman Islands and England.

With the growth of the company, there has been a demand for more products and additional colors.

"In five years, we expect to become a large-scale company with a broader range of products."

The company puts out a catalogue, a witty newsletter, a seasonal publication, and the comprehensive Web site with the three smiling partners wearing white shirts, black socks and no pants.

On the fashion scene, Goren says that there has been a shift. "More and more men are moving away from the traditional dress shirts in the office environment, to a more casual dress – and it is picking up momentum across the country."

He explains that at first, many business establishments had the casual Friday, then the casual summer; this has led to a more casual atmosphere all the time except for board meetings, when executives have to dress appropriately.

"With this change," he notes, "you have to use more imagination. You have to be perceived as a success.

"Fashion runs in cycles. I think that in the next three to five years, there will be a swing back from casual to traditional. Some companies are defining the perimeters for dress."

Along with traditional shirts in a variety of colors and stripes, and monogrammed button-down shirts, the fall catalogue features 100 percent-cotton mock turtlenecks that look and feel like cashmere; a variety of belts; underwear; socks in a variety of colors; T-shirts, and other sports shirts.

Goren predicts that olive green should be huge this fall, and khaki is still very strong.

He says that 75 percent of their products are made in Canada and the company has a record of less that five percent returns with 95 percent of the returns requesting an exchange of size.

Goren points out that electronic commerce is booming. "In fact, North American consumers spent approximately $3.5 billion in 1998, more than triple the previous year."

The customers are shaping their business, he says. "Our customer base keeps growing and customers are asking for products."

To accommodate the growing business, which now exceeds $1 million dollars a year in sales, the company is preparing to move into new and larger quarters, and they are planning to have a showroom.

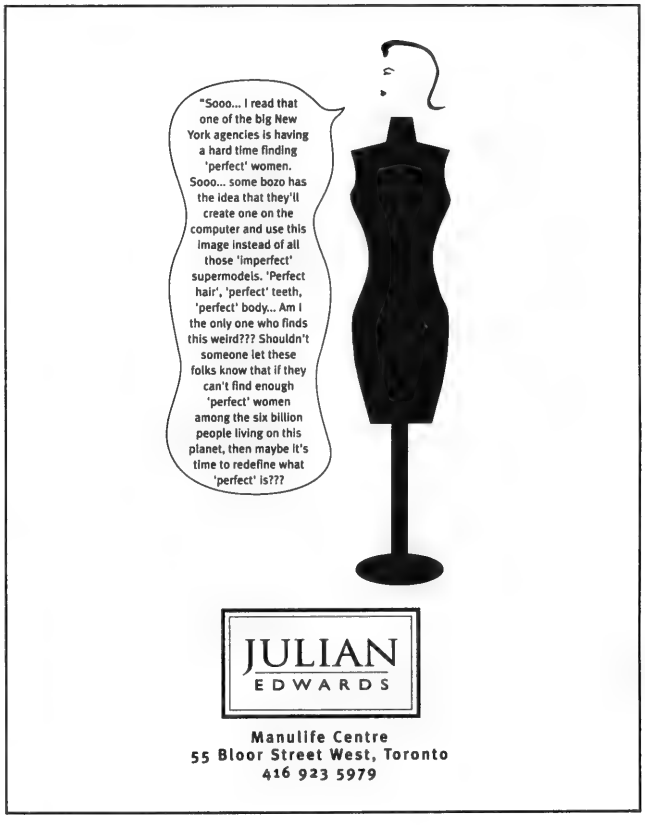
have been inconceivable – when people dressed up for most occasions, even dinner. Think of Frank Sinatra with the suits and the hats; and June cleaver in her shirtwaist dresses and pearls.

In this day and age, people don't dress up if they don't have to – it's a more casual lifestyle. Most casual clothing is not all that memorable — it's jeans, jeans and more jeans.

Beckerman spends more time describing the clothes she wore than her feelings about loves and losses in her life. For example, she mentions her mother's death some time in the mid-'40s, without dwelling on any details.

Yet the book is somewhat of a tribute to her mother, a hard-working woman who died young. Beckerman goes to great lengths to document her mother prowess as seamstress: She made most of Beckerman and her older sister Blossom's clothes.

Love, Loss and What I Wore is a lightweight book. It would never make the best seller list or the Book of the Month Club. Nevertheless, there's a certain charm in the simplicity of the narrative and the illustrations. It's an easy read, as most picture books are.



"Sooo... I read that one of the big New York agencies is having a hard time finding 'perfect' women. Sooo... some bozo has the idea that they'll create one on the computer and use this image instead of all those 'imperfect' supermodels. 'Perfect hair', 'perfect' teeth, 'perfect' body... Am I the only one who finds this weird??? Shouldn't someone let these folks know that if they can't find enough 'perfect' women among the six billion people living on this planet, then maybe it's time to redefine what 'perfect' is???

Sweatshirts are essential wardrobe pieces

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

As soon as the calendar flips to August, there is an unmistakable chill in the morning air. It is the time to dress in layers that can be progressively taken off during the day.

I reach for my new, basic black, designer Donna Karan New York long-sleeved sweatshirt, knowing that the name is a misnomer. I will never sweat in my designer duds.

We can thank athletes for putting the sweatshirt into everybody's dresser. Used initially as heavyweight cotton over-shirts for post-exercise warm-ups, they soon caught on as track suits for the amateur athlete, and then were taken under designers' wings and touted as an essential part of every wardrobe.

Known for comfort, sweatshirts usually come in cotton inside and out, with the inside having a fleecy texture.

According to Lenny Rebner, president of Montreal-based textile importer, Lentex, it is important to look for a heavier weight cotton fabric when choosing a sweatshirt.

"A sweatshirt that is weighted at 13, 14 or even 18 ounces provides better durability," says Rebner.

We all have our favorite brand of sweats from Canadian fashion leaders to giant American retailers, but it's really kids of all ages who seem to set the tone for what's in and what's not in sweatshirts each season.

There is no better place to wear a warm, cozy sweatshirt than in the country, where I recently had the opportunity to spend two weeks with a whole group of fashion forward young people at the Harry Bronfman Y Country Camp in Huberdeau, Que.

Ben Levine, 17, a student at Dawson College, looks for comfort when he's at camp.

'The bigger the better'

"The bigger the better," says Levine. "It's got to be long with pockets and loose at the bottom – no elastic."

Levine tends to wear sweatshirts after sports, but also looks to sweatshirts for comfortable dressing.

Eric Brener, an 18-year-old student at Toronto's York University, looks for designer sweatshirts. He prefers name brands but sticks to basic colors of blue and black.

High quality is what counts for Marianopolis student, Renee Fogelbaum, also 18. The look and feel must be comfortable. She prefers to wear sweatshirts sporting the names of universities and professional and college teams. Fogelbaum's favorites are the Bulls and "any team from Michigan."

Her style preference leans towards hooded sweatshirts with kangaroo pockets in front to keep her hands warm in.

Fogelbaum scours the sports stores and her old stand-by, she says, is ROOTS, although she also likes designer favorites Diesel and Calvin Klein.

"Wearing a designer name on your sweatshirt gives you the allure of being in style," says Fogelbaum.

Classic colors of blue and gray make up the sweatshirt collection of Jennifer Ornstein, 17, a Dawson student. "I want to be comfortable when I sit in class," she says, "and a sweatshirt does the trick."

But 9-year-old camper, Arielle, sums up the fashion cachet of the sweatshirt as follows: "It has to be baby blue and it has to be cozy!"

Cousellors Renee Fogelbaum and Jennifer Ornstein of the Harry Bronfman Y Country Camp in Huberdeau, Que., warm up on a cold camp morning with their young charges in sweatshirts in various styles, and sizes. [Anita Szabadi-Gottesman]

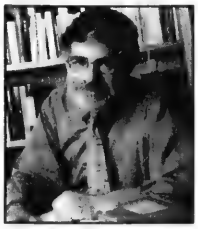
The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

A Challenging Environment for Growth and Continuity

A MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR



That the Jewish year and the academic year are in phase is accidental but altogether appropriate. Learning is a central aspect of Judaism; Jews are known as the "people of the book." In Canada and elsewhere they have exhibited an extraordinary level of commitment to achievement in education.

In recent years, Jewish life everywhere has been energized by renewed dedication to Jewish learning in a variety of settings. York University's Centre for Jewish Studies is one of the most active and vibrant Jewish learning centres in Canada with some 1000 course registrations each year. Course offerings range from Bible, rabbinics, and Hebrew language to contemporary Canadian Jewry, Holocaust, and Sephardic Studies. We offer B.A., B.Ed. (Jewish Education), M.A., M.Ed., and Ph.D. degrees as well as lectures and seminars for the public.

During the past few years, we have added three chairs in Jewish Studies and significant scholarship endowments. This year, for the first time, we co-sponsored an archaeological dig in Israel. And we continue to develop exciting new initiatives, some of which are featured on this page.

As the old year closes, I want to thank all those who have generously supported our Centre during the past year, as well as the students and faculty who are its mainstay. As the new year begins, I want to invite students, faculty, and the community to become part of the unique Jewish learning environment at the York University Centre for Jewish Studies.

Best wishes for a shana tova especially a shnat limudim tova, for a good year in study and in every other way.

Professor Michael Brown

RENOWNED HOLOCAUST WRITER TO INAUGURATE NEW SILBER FAMILY CHAIR IN HOLOCAUST AND EASTERN EUROPEAN JEWISH STUDIES

Aharon Appelfeld, one of the best known and most highly regarded contemporary Hebrew novelists and author of more than 40 books, will visit the York Centre for Jewish Studies from March 10-20, 2000, as writer/scholar in residence. His visit will inaugurate the new Silber Family Chair in Holocaust and Eastern European Jewish Studies.

JEWISH EDUCATORS TO CONSULT AT YORK

A gathering of leading Jewish educators from schools across North America is scheduled to take place at York in late October. Professor Alex Pomson, professor of Jewish Education, will host the meeting of ALOHA, the Association of Institutions for Higher Learning in Jewish Education.

NEW FACULTY JOIN THE CENTRE FAMILY

Professor Sara Horowitz is a well-known scholar of Jewish literature who has taught at the University of Delaware. Author of Voicing the Void: Muteness and Memory in Holocaust Fiction, she will be teaching Humanities and Hebrew literature.

Professor Eric Lawee is a distinguished young scholar who has been teaching at Stanford University. He writes about medieval messianism and commentaries; he will be teaching rabbinics and medieval Jewish civilization.

Dr. Seymour Epstein, the new director of the Board of Jewish Education, has taught at McGill University and worked in Jewish education in Israel, Russia, Morocco, Europe, and Canada. He will be teaching in the Jewish Teacher Education Programme.

Dr. Rachel Turkienicz is an alumna of York's Jewish Teacher Education Programme and a highly regarded teacher and administrator at the Heschel School. She will join the faculty of the Jewish Teacher Education Programme.

NEW ARCHAEOLOGY DIG SPONSORED BY YORK AND BAR-ILAN

This past summer 20 students and volunteers from York, under the direction of Professor Carl Ehrlich of the Centre for Jewish Studies, helped to uncover Tel Gath, a site in Israel associated with Goliath and the Phillistines. Anyone eager to join next summer's expedition should contact the Centre.

Apartments for psychiatric clients offer freedom

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When Abram Friedland fell ill a few years ago as a result of a reaction to medication he was taking for schizophrenia, the setback would eventually prove to be a turning point in his life.

Schizophrenic since childhood, Friedland had been rather isolated, living in a rooming house. After his medication was adjusted, however, he was able to get an apartment of his own in a building for those with chronic but stable psychiatric conditions, run by Jewish Family Services (JFS).

Tenants live independently in 19 units in two buildings, with a counsellor on the premises to provide supervision and support.

They have the advantage of affordable rent, help with daily living skills like budgeting and meal planning, and overcoming stress. They also have access to social, recreational and educational activities, and a link with community life and resources.

Friedland, now 31, has a university degree and was working, but not at what he would like to do.

The JFS support has provided him with contact with other people and exposed him to new interests. "I've made friends and I learned how to write poetry, and was helped to get published," he said.

He spent three years in the supervised apartment and last year "graduated" to his own place. But he continues to drop in at the supervised apartment twice a month for its group meetings held in one unit reserved for that purpose. These are mainly social gatherings.

Through JFS's community-based mental health support services, Friedland has been able to go back to school to get a certificate enabling him to teach math to adults. He is also now doing volunteer work at Le Mercaz, the Jewish community's depot for distributing goods to the poor.

"The program has been very helpful to me. I speak to Marcie Klein (co-ordinator of the support services) two or three times a weeks and bounce ideas off her. She's very supportive if I have a problem," he said. "It's been a very positive experience. I owe them a lot."

JFS's support services are designed to help the adults involved live as autonomously as possible in the community. With new drugs and cutbacks in the number of psychiatric hospital beds, more and more such people find themselves on their own. Too often they do not receive adequate follow-up, and live lives with little structure.

The services include long-term individual and group programming; advocacy and outreach, through home visits and phone contact; and a special effort to strengthen Jewish identity, including holiday and Shabbat celebrations, cultural activities and access to the community's chaplaincy services. The program is open equally to those living on their own, with family or in foster homes.

"The program is very client-directed. We try to fit the services to what they want," said Klein, a social worker. Currently, about 45 people use the services. They suffer from schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, severe depression and anxiety. Some have had long hospitalizations, but are well enough to cope fairly well on their own now. All are expected to continue to be connected to a health care provider.

'Very positive experience'

"We are not psychiatrists. Our role is not to ensure that they take their medication, but we do monitor, and if they do not show up or there appears to be something wrong, we can get in touch with their professional," Klein said.

The program is now in its fourth year and grew out of the findings of a task force made up of Jewish community agencies and hospitals.

"A lot of gaps were identified, particularly in services to adults," said Harriet Tobman, JFS coordinator of family and children's services. "A lot of people were slipping through the cracks of what is provided by departments of psychiatry and CLSCs, which are overtaxed already."

Too many people with psychiatric disorders are living alone, often lacking the motivation to even get out of bed, she said. They may have families, but they often cannot cope with all their needs.

The program, of course, has its limitations, both in terms of budget and the extent to which it can serve a population that is frequently reluctant to come forward for help.

"There is still a strong taboo surrounding mental illness," Tobman said. "We usually receive referrals from hospitals or family, but it is a constant challenge to get people to come out. They are very reluctant to come forward because of the stigma. They have a fear of being labelled."

Volunteers do much of the work. Klein is the only full-time staff member attached to the program.

Users of the program are matched, one on one, with a volunteer, who helps with living skills or just encourages them to get out.

"Some of the people we serve are really struggling. Just to go out for a walk and a cup of coffee is an accomplishment," Klein said. "We measure success in increments. Once a year, we look back at our progress."

Where possible, the goal is to reintegrate clients into a "normal" life. Courses are offered, through the English Montreal School Board, in social skills and stress management, as well as practical training in computers and French, in order for them to rejoin the work force.

Clients are also encouraged to perform volunteer work in community agencies and projects, to make them feel productive and part of a team.

A common concern among the aging parents is who will look after their mentally ill adult children after they are gone, Klein said. Future Care, a new component of the program, has recently been set up to at least partly answer that need.

Parents can establish a trust under the administration of the Jewish Community Foundation to provide for their children financially. In addition, JFS will evaluate and manage their personal care.

The demand for supervised housing is increasing. The 19 JFS apartments are full and there is always a waiting list. The supervised apartments are totally government-funded, and about half the tenants are not Jewish. The community services, funded by the Jewish community, are aimed at Jewish clients.

The JFS program is valuable, but it is "just a drop in the bucket" when it comes to meeting the needs out there, said Ella Amir, executive director of AMI-Quebec, an organization serving the mentally ill and their families.

Supported housing is the biggest lack, she said. "It's not the quantity, but the range of options in terms of the level of supervision that is missing. If you are very limited or very autonomous, there is something. But in between, there are very few resources."

As a result, these people are either going back to the parents, which is at best a temporary solution, or, more tragically, ending up on the street, Amir said.

The mentally ill are not likely to come forward for help, that's why reaching out to them is so essential, she said.

MAYOR LASTMAN DECLARES "YIDDISH CULTURE WEEK"

Commemorating the third biennial Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture, which opens Aug. 30 and runs through Sept. 6 at Toronto's Harbourfront, Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman has proclaimed this "Yiddish Culture Week."

In only its third incarnation, Ashkenaz has become one of the biggest and most lively events in Toronto's Jewish cultural calendar. As detailed in The CJN last week, Ashkenaz features a wide variety of music, theatre, dance, lectures, storytelling, film, visual arts, readings and other cultural events, most free. More than 175 artists are participating.

For program details, call Harbourfront Information, 973-3000, or the box office, 973-4000.

Israeli Naive Art: The current issue of Ariel, the Israel Review of Arts and Letters, features an interesting piece, entitled "A Century of Naive Art in Israel," by Angela Levine. The essay is enhanced by 8 pages of color illustrations.

Levine describes the life and works of a variety of artists, many of whom were underrated and somewhat neglected in their day. Some, she says, were almost prophetic, such as Moshe El-Natan Khodadad, who in the 1950s painted Jews leaving Russia, rockets menacing the world, and space capsules reaching the moon.

Other naive painters explored the shtetls of Europe, Bible scenes and the drama of contemporaneous Israeli life, such as the disembarkation of illegal immigrants in the 1930s and 1940s.

Levine claims there are no naive painters among the recent wave of Russian immigrants to Israel, but identifies several "true naive" artists among recent immigrants from Morocco and Ethiopia. Her thoughtful survey concludes with a concern about the continuation of this rough school of art.

Jewish themed films at the Toronto Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The shifting fortunes of a Jewish family in Hungary.

The travails of a Jew in Nazi-occupied Poland.

The criminal career of a Nazi bureaucrat instrumental in implementing the Holocaust.

The tangled lives of a group of Russian immigrants in an Israeli apartment building.

These are among the themes of a medley of Jewish-interest movies to be presented at the 24th edition of the Toronto International Film Festival, which runs from Sept. 9 to 18.

Sunshine, by Oscar-winning Hungarian director Istvan Szabo (Mephisto and Colonel Redl), is set against a backdrop of political upheaval, armed conflict and the Holocaust.

Starring Ralph Fiennes and Rosemary Harris, the film concentrates on three generations of the Sonnenschien clan. Their lives are variously influenced by the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, Nazism and Communism.

In Jakob the Liar, Robin Williams portrays Jakob Heym, an optimistic Jewish cafe owner who broadcasts fictitious news bulletins about the war in order to combat depression and suicidal tendencies among his fellow Jews in the Polish city of Lodz.

Directed by Peter Kassovitz, the movie is based on a novel by Jurek Becker, who was an inmate in the Lodz ghetto and a succession of Nazi concentration camps.

The Specialist, by Eyal Sivan, examines the mind-set of Adolf Eichmann, the bland functionary who was one of the masterminds of Hitler's Final Solution.

Sivan distills 350 hours of footage from Eichmann's trial in Jerusalem in an effort to better understand his mentality and motivations.

Focusing on Israel's growing influx of Jews from the former Soviet Union, Yana's Friends has the feel of a documentary.

It revolves around two newly arrived families in difficult circumstances who are trying to fit into their adopted homeland. It is directed by Arik Kaplun.

Errol Morris' Mr. Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter, Jr. is a chilling portrait of an American technician who fell under the influence of Toronto neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel and became a Holocaust denier.

The Girl of Your Dreams, from Academy Award winning Spanish filmmaker Fernando Trueba (Belle Epoque), is a Life is Beautiful kind of comedy which unfolds in Berlin following the Nazi seizure of power.

Invited to Germany to make a film, the cast and crew of a Spanish troupe are inexorably drawn into local controversies amid the eruption of mutual cultural differences. The leading lady is wooed by Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels, but she saves her considerable charms for a Jewish extra.

Moloch, a Russian/German co-production, explores 24 hours in the life of Hitler, the personification of evil. Alexandr Sokurov, the director, takes Hitler's measure through his relationship with Eva Braun, his mistress.

In After the Truth, a thriller by Roland Suso Richter, an idealistic young lawyer is forced to defend one of the arch war criminals of the Third Reich, Josef Mengele, the so-called Angel of Death.

Robin Williams in Jakob the Liar.

Zyklon Portrait, a Canadian film by Elida Schogt, is a cinematic essay on Zyklon-B, the gas of choice of Nazi concentration camp commanders.

Cultural and religious dissonance is the theme of Lea Pool's Emporte-Moi, which studies the dysfunctional marital relationship of a French Canadian Catholic and her Jewish immigrant husband.

From the faraway land of Mali comes Cheick Oumar Sissoko's film, Genesis, a meditation on the three monotheistic religions – Judaism, Christianity and Islam. The biblical tale of Joseph and Jacob is deftly transplanted on African soil.

Kadosh, seething with love and passion, takes place in Mea Shearim, the stronghold of haredim in Jerusalem. Amos Gitai directs.

The brainchild of Jonathan Sagall, Urban Feel is a comtemporary urban drama. It's about the woes of an unhappily married couple in Israel which are magnified when an old flame suddenly appears on the scene.

Young director successfully links plays at festival

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Michael Kessler, the 23-year-old Toronto actor/director, had two plays on the future of young thespians, but he needed a third.

When he bombarded the theatre community through his fax machine, established playwright Jason Sherman replied with Equity Rules, an unproduced play that fit the bill.

Kessler wove the three together and came up with Ulcers Before Adolescence, one of the hits of the 40-play Summerworks festival at the Tarragon and Factory Theatres.

What the young director, a graduate of the University of Toronto-Sheridan College drama course, did, was write connecting lines to link the three plays, to show the plight of young actors, "when there is so little work for so many of us that we lose touch with what we want to be."

His motor is the interview in which a corporate personnel manager questions the eager applicant about motivation and receives the dishonest answers he expects.

Kessler works this interview, which he wrote, into all three plays, Equity Rules, plus two American pieces, The Lives of Great Waitresses by Nina Shengold and The M Word by Alan Ball.

Like most young directors, he tends to give his connecting lines too much exposure.

The surprising thing about The M Word is that it was written in 1990, so up to date is it in the way that Derek T. Perks proposes marriage to Nicole St. Martin, with an overleaf presentation on the assets and liabilities each will bring to the marriage. She plays it cool all the way through, keeping him on the hook, but lets out a war whoop of joy as soon as he leaves.

In Sherman's play, aspiring actress Jenny Kuipers gives all the reasons she shouldn't do it, but finally disrobes for scheming director Arthur Wachnik, in order to get the role.

Shengold's play deals with the more familiar territory of young actors working in restaurants as servers while they wait for the big break, revealing along the way their own frustrations and cynicism.

The partnership between Sherman and Kessler has proved so successful that the two are working on a one-hour adaptation, as yet untitled, of three plays, but this time Sherman is in it from the beginning. They plan to stage it next year.

In the meantime, Kessler is working on a remount of Ulcers Before Adolescence, hopefully to be presented at Tarragon's Mainspace in December.

Jenny Kuipers and Arthur Wachnik heat things up in Jason Sherman's contribution to Ulcers Before Adolescence.

Business Profile

The headhunter's role is crucial in big business

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In primitive societies, headhunters stalk and decapitate their prey, preserving their heads as trophies. In advanced countries, such as Canada, headhunters are a completely different breed, politely chatting up their targets before pouncing.

Headhunters, or executive search consultants, play an important role in North American corporate culture. They shuffle human capital like so many pieces on a chess board, placing executives in positions of authority.

Dov Zevy, a founding partner of Pratzer & Partners Inc., one of Canada's premiere search firms, claims that headhunters add value to corporations by virtue of supplying them with top-flight personnel.

"We're absolutely critical to a company's success," said Zevy, who works out of a smart suite of hushed offices on the 47th floor of the Scotia Plaza in downtown Toronto.

Established 10 years ago, Pratzer & Partners specializes in financial and professional services, information technology and real estate. Headed by Elan Pratzer, the company is managed by five partners, all of whom perform headhunting duties.

Zevy, 35, says that headhunting in Canada has grown by about 20 percent each year since 1993. "It has been an incredible growth industry."

According to Executive Recruiter News, the bible of the business, North American-wide revenues have skyrocketed from $5.3 billion in 1996 to $7.4 billion in 1998.

And while Zevy is tight-lipped about Pratzer & Partners' revenues, he suggested that he and his colleagues have no reason to complain. Headhunting is and will be in high demand for some time to come.

For one thing, executive talent has grown scarce of late. And the forecast is that it will be even scarcer in the future.

By Zevy's estimation, baby boomers are aging, and their gradual departure from the workplace will leave a yawning gap in the ranks of middle management.

Furthermore, companies are more demanding, the economy is becoming more complex and global, and new industries, notably e-commerce, are fueling demand for qualified executives who can cope with the new environment.

In an effort to better serve its clientele, Pratzer & Partners has expanded into the United States, having opened an office in Chicago eight months ago. And now it is trying to establish a presence in New York City by buying a search company there, said Zevy, a graduate of the University of Ottawa (BA) and York University (MBA).

If the deal goes through, as he fully expects, Pratzer & Partners will be a formidable force. "We'd be in the top 30 firms in the United States, where the opportunities are greater and where a lot of our clients are expanding."

Pratzer & Partners, though, has no plans to add offices elsewhere in Canada. "We have Canada more or less covered from Toronto," he explained.

Specializing in servicing corporations, multinationals and smaller enterprises, the company came into being on the eve of the 1990 recession, and Zevy has been there from the beginning.

The father of three children ranging in age from three to seven, he grew up in Montreal and Ottawa.

His parents, Marco and Fernande, lived in Cairo until 1956. They immigrated to Canada in the wake of the Suez war.

"They left Egypt right after the Suez crisis. It was becoming increasingly difficult for Jews to lead a happy life in Egypt."

From Cairo, the Zevys went to Israel, where Marco, a chemical engineer and a Cairo University graduate, had no trouble finding a job. Home was Kiryat Motzkin, a suburb of Haifa.

They emigrated from Israel in 1959 for family reunification purposes. In an ironic twist, Zevy's married sister, Danielle Leiba, made aliyah last year.

Zevy, whose wife Caroline is an occupational therapist, was previously employed by the Royal Bank of Canada as an account manager. He can thank his brother, Ron, a writer and publisher of children's books, for having introduced him to Elan Pratzer.

He and Pratzer, a headhunter, hit it off immediately. And shortly afterwards, when Pratzer decided to to form his own search business, he asked Zevy to come aboard as a researcher and partner.

Dov Zevy

"I saw it as an opportunity to get into something new at the ground floor and grow with it. That was 10 years ago, and here we are. It has been tremendous and terribly exciting. We've grown from zero and not being on the map to one of the top 10 in Canada."

Pratzer & Partners, which has 20 employees, typically works with high-end executives whose annual salaries start at $125,000. But there have been two cases where new recruits received $1 million in compensation, counting stock options.

On an average day, Zevy spends two to three hours on headphones speaking to prospective candidates. The headhunting process is laborious and thorough.

During the diagnostic phase, Zevy ascertains exactly what a client needs. Having collected the data, he calls sources and targets individuals whom he subsequently interviews.

"We make from 100 to 200 phone calls per search."

Two to three weeks later, he compiles a short-list of suitable candidates for the client to assess. Beyond expertise in a particular field, Zevy looks for certain qualities in an interviewee.

"For senior executives, it's strong leadership skills, vision, the knack of reacting well to change, and a great deal of emotional intelligence, which I define as the ability to read people and situations and deal with problems, confrontations and decisions."

In about 10 percent of the cases, the client is dissatisfied with the short-listed candidates, forcing Zevy to begin anew.

Once a candidate is selected, Zevy plays a role in the negotiations. When the person is finally placed, he keeps in touch with him or her. And throughout this strenuous process, he talks constantly to his client.

Headhunting does not come cheaply. The fee is equal to one-third of a newly-hired executive's first-year salary.

In about five percent of cases, an executive, for whatever reason, fails to pan out, Zevy acknowledged.

Keeping this worst-case scenario in mind, he always endeavors to be an honest broker when discussing a position with a candidate.

"We do not have a back-slapping approach or attitude. We're honest and open. And while we're working for a client, our candidates see us as advisors whom they can trust.

"You have to be able to see an opportunity from their point of view. If you don't, you'll find yourself in one of those five percent situations."

Anti-Semitism, widely prevalent in corporate North America until quite recently, has not affected Zevy in the slightest.

"In the 10 years I've been in search, and in two years of banking, I've never encountered anti-Semitism. I'm sure it still exists, but I've been fortunate."

Family and continuity 'mark' sculptor's exhibit

BY ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO— The life's work of a celebrated Canadian sculptor from Toronto's Jewish community has been chosen as the focus of a retrospective exhibition.

May Marx, whose sculptures have been widely exhibited in Canada, and abroad, since the mid-1960s, is currently showcased in The Story So Far..., a collection of her best known works.

Survivor

The feature show illustrates the evolution of Marx's work spanning over three decades. The 70-year-old artist says her motivation to produce has come from a clarity of purpose.

"I remember one sunny September day after Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, I asked myself 'On a day like this, why am I standing in this studio?' It was a question I had wrestled with for many years," Marx says.

"Then it came to me. When I remembered the cantor's words during [those recent] services 'what will happen is sealed', I knew then and there that this work was sealed. It was my destiny."

Receiving critical and commercial acclaim for her expressive abstract sculpting in her chosen medium of bronze, The Story So Far... features sculptures and acrylic paintings.

Much of the exhibit has been inspired by the dynamic of intergenerational relationships, that connects families through time and space, in both a personal and Jewish context.

She says she considers most of her work a diary in bronze that serves as a record of her own family life, but is not limited in interpretation to her alone.

"Early in my career, I began to create works that were more interpretive, like open vessels, where people could view it and project their own family history and legends," she says.

"This [collection] honors the circle of all family life in change and rebirth. It also reflects the circle of Jewish family life because Judaism honors those before us. It acts as a conduit between the past and future, and that life is ultimately about going forward."

Marx says the exhibition's centre-piece Continuum, a large bronze abstract sculpture, represents her pivotal exploration – and celebration – of the family theme.

"For me, this piece binds all the sculptures, and draws together the roles held by ancestors and descendants. It brings focus to all the pieces that celebrate the life that I had with my husband, the events in my children's lives, my five grandchildren, and even the great- great- grandmother in Russia I was named for."

In the mid-1980s, Marx turned her talents towards the United Israel Appeal of Canada. For each of the four years leading up to Israel's 40th anniversary, Marx contributed to the creation of a limited edition award given to UIA volunteers across Canada in appreciation of their efforts to raise funds through the sale of Israel bonds.

Marx has remained active in Toronto's Jewish society as a member of Beth Habonim. Having served in volunteer and administrative capacities, she says she has felt a sense of kinship for the synagogue, as it was founded by Jewish-German refugees of the Holocaust – her late husband was one.

Marx says one of her greatest undertakings in the Jewish community has also been a piece of emotional and professional unfinished business.

In 1967, Marx sculpted Survivor, a larger-than-life-size sculpture of a solitary concentration camp victim. This 'horrific' image of a man with hollow eyes was exhibited at Holy Blossom Temple and, by coincidence, on the same day that the Six Day War began.

While talk started by congregation members to have Survivor cast in bronze as their Holocaust memorial, all project funding by the temple was immediately diverted to war efforts in Israel.

The project was never completed beyond that point. It remained in her downtown studio for more than 30 years. Marx says it is one of her goals to see the sculpture finished as a memorial within the community.

In the same week that The Story So Far... opened, Marx was also the subject of a foreign exhibit. Marx became the first Canadian invited to join a group show presented by the Grassi Museum in Leipzig, Germany. Her work is being featured alongside six German sculptors. Several of her bronzes are part of that gallery's exhibition.

Over the years Marx's work has been exhibited in dozens of Canadian galleries, including the Art Gallery of Ontario, the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, and the McMichael Gallery, as well as in galleries in the United States and Europe.

Her sculptures have made their way to some noteworthy private collections, including those of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and former Chrysler Corporation chairperson Lee Iaccoca.

Looking toward the future, Marx is currently in discussion with Baycrest Centre to create a work for its premises.

May Marx's The Story So Far... runs through to Sept. 17 at the Sculpture Society of Canada Gallery at 130 King St., W., – Exchange Tower, main floor. Show hours are Tuesday to Friday 12 to 6 p.m.; Saturdays 1 to 4 p.m. For more information, call 214-0389.

This year's Ashkenaz festival highlights visual art

More than music, film and theatre

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

While music is certainly the largest part of the biennial Ashkenaz Festival in Toronto, there are also other events.

In addition to the film, literary and theatre events previewed in past editions of The CJN there is a wide display of visual arts exhibitions.

From Rediscovering the Yarmulke

Rediscovering the Yarmulke takes a fresh look at the yarmulke. Seven artists (Laura Donefer, Lynn Heller, Barbara Klunder, Haya Nativ, Heather McCrimmon, Janet Morton and Russel Zeid), were asked to interpret the yarmulke in a contemporary context. Their results range from whimsical and playful to highly personal. (to Sept. 8)

From Jewish Sites

The Word explores the relationship of language to cultural identity. The artists (Mira Covinensky, Simon Glass, Nina Levitt and Wendy Oberlander, Ruth Liberman, Cynthia Madansky, Sylvia Ptak, Howi Ross, B.H. Yael) translate some of the literal and spiritual aspects of Hebrew and Yiddish into a tangible format, creating a visual dialogue between past beliefs and current practices. (to Sept. 12)

Jewish Sites of North Africa is an exhibit of photographs by D.R. Cowles. Through a series of photographs of synagogues, cemeteries and shrines, Cowles documents a way of life that is quickly disappearing. (to Sept.12 at York Quay Gallery II)

Streetlife is an exhibition of drawings, paintings and prints that focus on the everyday lives of ordinary people. The artists (Aba Bayefsky, Ghitta Caiserman-Roth, Eric Drooker, Harry Gottlieb, Louis Muhlstock, Henry Orenstein and Howard Podeswa) were all raised in the Diaspora and their work captures a Jewish culture in transition. (to Sept. 12, York Quay Gallery)

The Jewish Labor Bund:1897-1997 is a collection of documents from the Bund's archives. They include clandestine brochures, underground leaflets, photographs and posters. (to Sept. 6 at the Community Gallery)

Papirshnitt is a collection of papercuts by Adam Whiteman on Yiddish themes. (to Sept. 6 at the Premiere Dance Theatre)

This year, Ashkenaz has commissioned some of Toronto's finest painters, graphic designers and theatre artists to design the site decorations. Inspired by ancient temples, Yiddish folk culture and the richness of their own visions, these artists have created stage surroundings and arched portals that draw people into the festival.

Sheldon Greenfeld

Racquetball champ strikes out in quest for Pan Am gold

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Canadian and world racquetball champion Sherman Greenfeld, bowed out with a whimper rather than a bang at the recent Pan American games.

Sherman Greenfeld

Playing before a hometown crowd in what may be his last major tournament, Greenfeld came up empty. Playing while hurt, he lost the semifinal to American Mike Bronfeld, and he lost the bronze medal to Puerto Rican player Rob De Jesus.

"It was a little frustrating that I was not able to play my best in front of my friends and relatives," Greenfeld says. "I plan to take the rest of August off to determine my future."

For much of the past 20 years, Greenfeld has been a dominant force in racquetball in Canada and in the world. At 37, the Winnipegger can look back on a career that includes a record 10 Canadian singles championships.

Last year, he captured the world title. This past winter, he won the Silver Medal at the 1999 Tournament of the Americas in Rosarito, Mexico.

He has been awarded the Order of the Buffalo by the province of Manitoba, and was Manitoba's Athlete of the Year last year.

He was chosen by the Canadian Olympic Association to recite the athlete's oath at the opening ceremonies of the '99 Pan Am Games.

Greenfeld expects to stay with the sport – which has been his life since he was 16 – in one capacity or another. "I may compete in smaller tournaments," he says. "Maybe I will coach juniors and become an official."

JCC MACCABI PARTICPANTS

These young athletes were part of the Toronto contingent at the JCC Maccabi games held recently in Rochester, N.Y.. Above, is a lively and spirited group from the opening ceremonies. Below is the swim team under the direction of coach Barrie Sachs, standing on the right.

Last Laugh

Thank you for calling the Interactive Tshuvah Hotline here in Heaven. Due to the approaching High Holy Days, which is our busiest season, all of our telephone lines are temporarily busy.

Please wait patiently as your call will be answered in sequence – and remember, patience is a virtue.

You will no doubt enjoy our musical selection of Yeshiva Rock and the Best of Shlomo Carlebach, while you wait.

Please note that these telephone lines will not be available on the two days of Rosh Hashanah, and on Yom Kippur.

For a voice recording in Ashkenazi English dialect, press 1, for Sephardi, press 2, for New York, press 3. If you are uncertain, press 4 and an operator will assist you.

If you have not used the Interactive Tshuvah Hotline before, you will need to listen carefully to our simple, sequenced, instructions.

This service is available for touch tone telephone users as a supplement to your davening at shul over the Ten Days of Awe. It is not a substitute.

Let us now begin. To access your personalized account of all your known aveirot (transgressions), including dates and affected parties, please press 1 now.

If you have not already apologized to the affected parties, please hang up now and call back when this has been done.

For a personalized list of aveirot towards HaKadosh Baruch Hu, please press 2.

Please note that in order to provide timely service to all callers, there is now a limit of 20 aveirot per person at one time.

Politicians will therefore require several visits to complete their inventory.

Humor columnists who frequently exceed their word counts, or use large words, should hang up now and try calling later, after the millenium.

Please select the aveirot you have committed this past year.

In case you have forgotten, we offer a list of the most popular aveirot. To activate this function, please press the pound (#) key.

Once you have chosen the proper aveirah, enter the code followed by the pound key.

As you enter your aveirah, our service will prompt you for your explanation.

If you committed the aveirah because he/she did it, press 1. If you did so by accident, but did not mean to, press 2. If you have a good reason, but won't tell anyone what it is, press 3. If you did so knowing you were wrong, but didn't think you would get caught, press 3. If you blame your legal counsel for the aveirah, press 4. If you blame the influence of Freud or television, press 5. If you blame it on Rock n' Roll, Rap and/or drugs, press 6. If you want to blame someone else for the aveirah but can't think of anyone in particular, press 7. At the conclusion of your aveirot, enter the star (*) key.

For those of you with 7 aveirot or less, we offer a tzaddik express line. Please press 1 to access this express line now.

This is only for real tzaddikim: if you think you are a tzaddik or tzaddeket, you are probably not.

Remember, no sneaking in with 8 or more aveirot. Please note that the same aveirah committed against two individuals counts as two items.

Now that you have entered your personal aveirot, you may access the Selichot component of our service.

As our computer reads out each aveirah you have indicated, please enter the contrition code.

For example, a 1 means you are only mildly sorry for your action, a 2 means you are somewhat sorry, but have mitigating circumstances and a good lawyer, 3 means you are very sorry but will likely repeat it and have a great lawyer, 4 means you are very, very, sorry, and will not repeat it unless there are mitigating circumstances and you have Dershowitz on retainer, and 5 means you are extremely sorry and will not repeat the aveirah under any circumstances, since you have only your second cousin's son-in- law who failed the bar twice. Please proceed with your Selichot sequence now…

Our computer has now processed your request for Kapparah (atonement). Before we reveal the decision results, you may increase your score by pledging additional tzedakah to your favorite charity.

All major credit cards are accepted. Please enter your pledge amount (in US dollars), followed by your credit card number and expiry date. Thank you.

Based on your aveirah score, Selichot score and tzedakah score, you have been granted conditional atonement.

This offer expires within one calendar year. Thank you for visiting the Tshuvah Hotline today, and remember, we know everything.

TOMATO EGGPLANT SOUP WITH COUSCOUS

- 2 tblsp olive oil
- 1 leek, white part only
- 2 small Japanese eggplants, peeled & diced
- 1 can tomatoes, chopped
- 1 tblsp tomato paste
- 2 tblsp chopped fresh basil
- 1/2 tsp dried oregano
- 1/2 tsp dried thyme
- 5 cups chicken or vegetable stock
- 1 cup couscous cooked
- salt & pepper
- fresh basil leaves for garnish

In a large saucepan, heat oil over medium-high heat. Cook leek and eggplant until soft, about 3 minutes. Stir in tomatoes, tomato paste, basil, oregano and thyme.

Cook until bubbly, about 4 minutes. Add stock and simmer 30 minutes. Puree in a food processor. Return to pot and stir in couscous. Reheat if necessary. Taste for salt and pepper. Garnish with basil leaves.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

For the past few years, girls my age did not care much about how they looked and what they weighed, but starting this year, everyone has become more aware of their looks. One of my friends, Rachel, used to eat normally, and she was not fat and not skinny. But this year, she has lost a lot of weight. Rachel is beginning to look sick and pale. I have said something to her, but she told me she has never felt healthier and I am overreacting. She has also started to exercise a lot. I know that exercise is healthy, but I am still worried about her. What should I do?

Tammy

Dear Tammy,

You are being a good friend and it is important that you are concerned for Rachel's health. It is possible that she may have an eating disorder. There are many different types of eating disorders, but your friend may be anorexic.

Remember that an eating disorder is a disease, and people who have eating disorders do not choose to have them. It seems that you and your friends are going through a transitional stage, from girls to young women. Some girls find this stage overwhelming and frightening, as their bodies are changing so quickly. There is a misconception in today's society that women must be thin in order to be beautiful. This is not true.

When someone is anorexic, they deprive themselves of food and lose weight rapidly. Sometimes anorexic people over-exercise and their bodies become weak and tired because they do not have enough energy to exercise. Rachel probably does not have very much energy anymore because everyone needs the energy from food to be active.

Any eating disorder is a dangerous disease and should be taken care of by an adult, guidance counsellor or a doctor.

Rachel needs help. The best way you can help her is by telling an adult, whether it be your parents, her parents, a teacher or even a trusted grandparent, aunt or uncle. These adults will help you make the right decisions regarding Rachel. I know that it will be hard for you to talk to an adult, and I am sure that you may feel like you are betraying Rachel, but you are not.

If you do not feel comfortable with speaking to an adult, you can call Kids Help Phone and speak to someone who will tell you what to do and where to find centres that help those with an eating disorder in your city or town. You are doing the right thing by actively seeking help for Rachel.

Kids Help Phone is a toll free line which you can call anywhere in Canada. The number is 1-800-668-6868.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto.

HI UJA, I'M ANSWERING THE CALL

That's all you have to say, in order to qualify for fabulous prizes when your UJA Federation campaigner calls. We'll be conducting Campaign 2000 telethons four times this year, starting September 13-16. During every telethon week, when you pick up the phone by saying "Hi, UJA, I'm answering the call," and increase your UJA gift, your name will go into a draw for wonderful rewards. But the biggest reward is knowing that your donation will change Jewish lives forever. So answer the call to assist thousands of Jews in need and answer the call to win. After all, winning has a nice ring to it.

Let us be gracious with others so that God may be gracious with us

The Machzor of High Holy Day prayers is a rich anthology of vivid poetry and heart-rending supplication. Combined with the familiar tunes that, for most of us, reach far back into our childhood, the experience of reading these poems and uttering the supplications can be profoundly moving.

There is one prayer in particular, at least in the Ashkenazi nusach, whose melody is so haunting and whose words are so stirring, that it often evokes goosebumps: Avinu Malkeinu, Our Father, Our King.

So important is the prayer that it is recited with the Ark open. Out of respect to the sifrei Torah, now in full view of the worshippers, the congregation stands.

Editorial

The prayer is a series of personal pleas and collective petitions entreating God to intervene on our behalf. It begins with a simple, one might even say abrupt, statement of confession and affirmation of faith. Afterward, it moves with increasing urgency in a forward momentum through a progression of requests culminating with seven different but very direct appeals to the Almighty, simply, to "act."

Then, as if the paytan, (liturgical poet), suddenly remembers to Whom, exactly, he is presenting these urgent pleas, and remorseful over their perhaps excessively insistent tone, he changes the weight and tenor of the last verse. It is steeped in contrition and humility. This is the verse that we all sing with rising voices, emotionally and in unison.

"Our Father, our King, be gracious with us and respond to us, for we are bereft of any deeds; bestow upon us righteousness and lovingkindness and grant us salvation." (Editor's translation)

Because of its poetry and its music, this prayer quickly pierces. It stabs at our vulnerability, the finitude of our lives, and envelops us with the realization that we have – all of us – so much more still to do, so much more in us and of us still to give.

We implore God to be gracious with us, but first, must we not be gracious with others? We implore God to respond to us; but first must we not respond to others?

We sing Avinu Malkeinu from the heart. Our sages tell us that "what emanates from the heart, penetrates the heart."

Thus, may our prayers this year be truly heartfelt. We and the world need it to be so.

And may 5760 bring us peace.

Shanah tovah tikateivu v'techatemu.

Rosh Hashanah message from the president of the State of Israel, Ezer Weizman

Dear Friends,

On the eve of Rosh Hashanah, we anticipate a breakthrough in the peace process, a process which will lead us, within a reasonable period of time, to peace between Israel and her neighbors. This coming year will be one in which crucial decisions will have to be taken, decisions which will influence the lives of the people of Israel and the character of the country for many years to come.

The end of the Israeli-Arab conflict is something we have dreamt of since the establishment of the state and even long before that. It will allow the country's leaders to devote all their energy and resources to education, strengthening the economy, fighting crime and the absorption of new immigrants.

In educating our youth, we must redouble our efforts to instill in them a sense of peoplehood and unity. At the same time, we must inspire our children with our rich and eternal traditions and the Hebrew language and culture. I pray for the day when our education budget will exceed our defense budget.

As we look ahead to the coming year and hope for a brighter future, I would, once again, like to call on you, our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora, to join us in the land of Israel. In an era of peace, Israel can offer its people a life of greater stability, spiritual enrichment and personal fulfillment. We will continue to strive for stronger relations between Israel and the Jewish communities in the world and hope for the fulfillment of the prayer: "Sound the great horn for our freedom; lift up the ensign to gather our exiles and gather us together from the four corners of the earth."

Shanah tovah u'gemar chatimah tova.

Rosh Hashanah message from the prime minister of the State of Israel Ehud Barak

Dear Friends,

From the city of Jerusalem, the eternal capital of the State of Israel, and the spiritual home of the Jewish people, I send you my warmest greetings for a happy, healthy and prosperous New Year. Shanah Tovah!

We, the citizens of Israel, share the deep concern of our fellow Jews throughout the world for the demographic future of the Jewish people. The open pluralistic societies of today have given Jews greater opportunities to integrate. Nevertheless, they have also posed the greatest challenge to the preservation of Jewish identity – the danger of assimilation.

Here in Israel we follow the global resurgence of anti-semitism, bigotry and racism with great anxiety. It is our sacred duty to be vigilant, to combat fanaticism and to spread the historic message of our Jewish tradition, a message of tolerance and openness.

The insightful Zionist thinker, Achad Ha'am, envisioned the Jewish state as the spiritual center and a source of pride for all Jews.

Within the next few decades of the 21st century, and thanks to the tireless efforts of devoted Jewish communities, we will reach a great Zionism milestone: the State of Israel will become the largest Jewish community in the world.

Israel today is a strong country. It is from this position of confidence that we reinvigorate the peace process with our Arab partners. Peace is an essential element of our security and, as difficult as the negotiating process may be, I am committed to making every possible effort to attain it. However, I assure you that the security of Israel and its citizens is my first and foremost concern, and I will allow nothing to compromise it. This is my guiding principle, and that of my government.

Israel's central duty is to provide a safe haven for the Jewish people, and this mission is deeply ingrained in our minds. We welcome all Jews wishing to build their homes here and participate in the development and strengthening of Israeli society. I believe that Israel's centrality in Jewish community life around the globe is essential for Jewish continuity and the preservation of Jewish identity in the Diaspora. At the same time, the Jewish communities in the developed countries are called upon to increase efforts to assist Israel to face these challenges.

The opening of the gates of the former Soviet Union to massive aliyah, the rescue of Jews from Ethiopia and other countries where they are in danger, and the wide-ranging efforts to absorb the

Time ripe for peace breakthrough: Blitzer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The time is ripe for a potential breakthrough in the Middle East peace process – not only between Israel and the Palestinians, but also with Syria and Lebanon, according to veteran CNN journalist Wolf Blitzer.

Speaking last week at the Sheraton Centre Hotel for the festive launch of UJA Federation's Campaign 2000, Blitzer told a sellout crowd of 1,200 people that he can envisage a day when the Israeli prime minister shakes hands with Syrian President Hafez Assad.

"Maybe not tomorrow," he said, "but the Syrians are going to have to come around...There's a lot happening behind the scenes moving this process forward."

Such a scenario would be the result of both countries realizing it would be in their best national interests, he said.

Having interviewed every Israeli prime minister since Golda Meir, he notes a passion in Ehud Barak that he hasn't seen in an Israeli prime minister "in some time."

UJA Federation campaign launched

Barak has "a commitment and intellectual readiness to go ahead and understand Israel's problems, Israel's security concerns, but at the same time recognizing that there [are] ... potential breakthroughs that could develop under the right circumstances."

There is optimism even among skeptics, said Blitzer, that this is "a rare historic moment" in which a breakthrough could lead to "a full peace agreement."

But there will still be plenty of dangers, warned Blitzer. Another crisis involving Saddam Hussein is a "very credible, realistic possibility."

Based on Israel's experience with Egypt and Jordan, Israelis "have always made it clear that the best way to convince [them] to make concessions is not by threatening them with war or terrorism. If anything, that will make the situation even more tense, more implacable."

Anwar Sadat, the late Egyptian president, paved the way for a peace treaty not by scaring Israel but by convincing Israelis he was sincere, noted Blitzer.

In an interesting side-note, speaker Avi Pazner, world chair of Keren Hayesod, recalled Sadat crediting Blitzer with giving him the idea for his historic visit to Israel, when Blitzer, then a reporter for the Jerusalem Post, asked during a 1977 Washington press conference, "You talk about peace. Why don't you go to Israel?"

The responsibility Blitzer carries professionally was underscored for him most pointedly when Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990.

A place for the living

The man had been a soldier in the Polish cavalry, had helped lead scores of people to safety through dangerous and deathly passageways, and was the master of every imaginable kind of sewing machine that worked and didn't work. It's not that he was fearless. He was not. Rather, he refused to submit to fear.

Yet when it came to taking the seat behind the wheel of his yellow Chevy Nova, he used a pillow and drove very slowly, and not always in the right-hand lane.

I didn't mind that he drove slow, although it agitated other drivers on the road. I usually sat beside him in the front and controlled the radio. I enjoyed being with him, even though he didn't talk much while he drove. He didn't talk much when he wasn't driving either.

But sometimes, it seemed to me, he would drive especially slowly, for example, when he went to visit the cemetery. It was a long trip, in any event to the cemetery. It was in the eastern outskirts of the city, many miles from our home.

Before Rosh Hashanah, in the waning days of Elul, we always drove to the cemetery, very slowly.

Of course, it wasn't only our custom to visit the cemetery before Rosh Hashanah. It's been the custom of the Jewish people throughout the ages, wherever Jews have lived.

Jews have always offered prayers at the graves of the departed, seeking from the souls of their family members or friends any helpful intervention in the lives of the living.

He went to the cemetery even though there were no graves of any of his immediate family there. In fact, there were no graves of any of his immediate family anywhere.

The Nazis made certain of that. They took away the lives of every member of his family down to the very last, except for him. Thus, they also took away his ability to visit any grave of any member of his large but vanished family.

But he went to the cemetery anyway, because it was the right thing to do at this time of year. And besides, after almost two decades in his new country, there were, unfortunately, other graves for him to visit, graves of friends he had known before the war and graves of friends he had made after the war.

The cemetery was a busy place, not with funerals, but with many other Jews visiting graves.

People walked, usually in small clusters, from one section of the cemetery to another, visiting graves in, for example, the Slipia section, Stashover, Apt, Radom, Zagliembier, Ostrovtzer, Chenstichov, Drildz, Vierszbneker, Tomaszov, Lodz and so on, in an entire realm and faraway world of unspellable places.

Because he could daven, could read and actually understand the holy language, and because he had so sweet and soul-stirring a voice, many people asked him to chant the prayer for graveside visits, K'El Maleh Rachamim, as if, by having him sing the words, they were improving the chances of their pleas being heard in heaven.

He obliged their requests. They wanted to pay him for doing so, but he never accepted.

Whether he knew the person in the grave, or whether he did not, I noticed that he was never able to chant the K'El Maleh Rachamim without being stopped by his own tears. He would always complete the prayer, of course, but in each chanting, once or twice, his breathing would falter, his voice would "hitch" and he would wipe his eyes. This didn't impair the force of the prayer however; it made it more poignant.

I thought I knew why this happened to him, a man who, after all, was not unfamiliar with sadness.

"K'El Maleh Rachamim, O God full of compassion," he would sing, "Who resides high above in the heavens...we recall to you the soul of...who has passed on to the next world..." (My translation)

He would carefully chant the name that was carved into the stone of the monument.

I always believed that as he sang that name, at the same time, each time, he also secretly sang a name that was carved into his heart.

I never discussed my belief with him, preferring to shelter his privacy rather than to satisfy my curiosity.

By the end of the visit to the cemetery, he was visibly tired.

I usually drove home.

Jews call a cemetery by a number of different names. There are at least three names that are commonly used. There may be more. They are: beit kvarot, a place (or house) of graves, a beit olam (in Hebrew) or beit almin (in Aramaic) a place of eternity; or a beit chaim, a place of life, or a place for the living.

I always found it strange to refer to a cemetery as "a place for the living." Over the years however, as time has led me to visit gravesides for my own private pleadings, the reference has seemed less and less strange.

After all, it is we, the living, who seek and beseech the souls of our departed, the people we have loved. And, in the custom of our forebears, we beseech those souls in the place they were buried, in the cemetery.

On the eve of Rosh Hashanah, I too visit the cemetery, just as he used to. But there is a difference.

The name carved into the stone that I chant is also the name carved into my heart. MBD

A NEW YEAR
A NEW BEGINNING.

Rosh Hashanah is traditionally a time to look back at the year just past. It is also a time of looking forward to a New Year... a new beginning.
May this New Year be one of peace. Peace of mind; peace of spirit. And may it bring peace to our homeland, and a new beginning for its people.

Toronto's leading Jews prepare to usher in new year

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Happy New Year! The hot topic this year is the dreaded Y2K bug, which we know wouldn't be an issue if our calendar had been used.

As we're welcoming in the new year, 5760, we have 40 years until the start of the next century, 240 years until the next millennium, (Y6K) and 4,240 years until Y10K.

Our esteemed roundup of quotable notables shared their thoughts with us, about the upcoming millennium:

Jehudi Kinar, the consul general of Israel says, "I'll tell you the truth, I don't know where I will be for Rosh Hashanah, because I am supposed to finish my tenure here, and my successor hasn't been appointed yet. So I am in a kind of limbo, and will probably be here in town.

"To my big regret it will be without the children who are in Israel. Usually we try to be together for Pesach and Rosh Hashanah."

Jehudi Kinar

He says that when they are in Israel, they go to a specific synagogue, but when they are here in Toronto, "I make myself available to go to different synagogues, which I do every time I am here."

Regarding Y2K, he reminds us that Israel, will probably be less affected than the rest of the world, "Since Y2K happens on a Friday night, a lot of things won't be working anyhow. For instance, El Al won't be flying, because at that time of the evening we won't have any planes in the air."

Eva Goldfinger is a madrichah, an ordained Secular Jewish Humanistic leader. She will be joining her Oraynu congregation, for Rosh Hashanah services, and then dining with her extended family, partaking in traditional Jewish meals.

"I like to spend time reading and studying Jewish subjects that are ethical and relevant to world issues. Our family likes to discuss how we each want to learn and grow in the coming year."

She adds, "The other thing I really like to do, is to take a walk in a very natural place, like a ravine, combining the experience with a humanistic tashlich.

"Whereas religious Jews throw breadcrumbs, symbolizing their sins into the water, I mitigate mine, by removing pollution or garbage from the environment."

As for the millennium bug frenzy, she says, "I am not an hysteric, and I am not at all concerned with the Y2K bug. I like to be prepared, but I won't worry, and whatever comes up, I'll deal with it."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, the director of Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, says, "I think Y2K is a lot of marketing hype and everybody is getting uptight for no reason.

"The year 2000 is relatively meaningless in Jewish time. We don't count time from the "year 1' of Jesus. At Kolel, we're actually down-playing the hype around the millennium."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

But she says, "We called in a guy to look at our database. Kolel as an organization will be ready."

It's a spiritual issue, she says. "We're going into 5760, what does that mean for me, as a Jew? I hope that Jews come home to Judaism, spiritually... I hope the Jewish renaissance continues."

Theatre impresario David Mirvish, says he is looking forward to the premiere of Cabaret, on Sept. 8, at the Princess of Wales Theatre.

In the Mirvish household, they observe the major holidays, he says. "For Rosh Hashanah, we usually have a family dinner...we all get together at some point during the holiday. We all go to the synagogue, my parents, my in-laws, my brother-in-law, and the kids. We occasionally have some very interesting theological discussions."

David Mirvish

On the topic of Y2K, he says, "Am I concerned about the world falling apart? Yesterday, one of my close, dear friends phoned and asked if I was putting any bottled water in my basement! It actually happened, I couldn't believe it!"

Shalom Magazzinich, the proprietor of The Chicken Nest, a kosher chicken and rib restaurant on Bathurst Street, says: "For the high holidays, my wife cooks a lot for us and our four kids... dishes I don't see everyday, like special fish, lamb, and good roast beef.

"We always put honey on the table to have a sweet year. It's a New Year, and we are hoping to be in the good books on that day, and our fate will be sealed on that day... Not only us, but all of Israel."

He says this year does feel a little special. "We can say that we lived through the year 2000, let's hope. But for us it's really 5760, and the Mashiach will come soon!"

Tuition fees up for most Jewish schools under BJE

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The new school year will have parents of children in Jewish day schools digging a bit deeper. Tuition is up at all but two of the 13 schools under the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE), but at an average hike of 2.5 percent, the rise in fees is described as reasonable.

This year, as last, there will be no fee increase at Leo Baeck Day School, where tuition again includes $633 per child for a building fund.

There is also no tuition increase this year at Beth Jacob High School for Girls.

For the second consecutive year, the sharpest rise in fees is at Ner Israel Yeshiva in Thornhill. The increase this year over last is just over six percent (not including room and board). The hike a year ago was four percent over the previous year.

The nominally higher fees are in line with low inflation and cost of living increases, says Bernard Shoub, director of school finances at the BJE. "They are nothing out of the norm," Shoub says. "We've tried to keep things under control."

The costs involving the large-scale renovations at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) will not be passed along to parents, at least not in the form of a sharp tuition increase. Fees at CHAT are up by just two percent, partly because the student population is expected to swell by roughly 200 this year.

The population of the BJE system (including non-funded and pre-school students) is approaching 11,000 pupils. Another 6,000 students are in the supplementary system.

Shoub said it was too early, as of last week, to tell how many students will get a subsidized education this year. Last year, roughly 40 percent of students in the BJE system did not pay full fees.

United Synagogue Day Schools is trying something new this year: one fee for students in grade one, and another, slightly higher rate for grades two through eight.

The four-year-old Toronto Heschel School, located at Beth David Synagogue, is affiliated with the BJE but receives no community funding. There too, fees are staggered along grades, and range from $7,700 to $8,000 for their full day programs.

Circle of Care set to honor volunteer organizations

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, Circle of Care (formerly Senior Care) will be presenting special community service awards to four organizations whose members have volunteered for the Meals on Wheels program.

Those organizations – the Adath Sholom Minyan Group, Chapter 17 of the National Council of Jewish Women, Shaar Shalom Congregation Sisterhood and Temple Har Zion Brotherhood – will be honored at a luncheon for more than 500 volunteers at Adath Israel Synagogue, on Sept 9. About 350 volunteers and special guests are expected to attend.

Contributions to Meals on Wheels by the volunteers of the four organizations included driving, recruiting new volunteers, and delivering to the northeast part of the Greater Toronto Area. The Shaar Shalom sisterhood distributed Purim goodies to Meals on Wheels recipients.

Maurice Rotfarb, who is on the boards of directors of Circle of Care and Habayit Shelanu, will receive the Memorial Ward, while Lillian Roebuck, who has been delivering kosher Meals on Wheels for more than 30 years, will receive the Sam Rotman Humanitarian Award.

The Selma Eisen Volunteer Education Award will be utilized toward a CPR course for volunteers.

Awards will be presented to volunteers in each program: Dr. Sidney Wise, kosher Meals on Wheels; Eva Goldberg, volunteer escort and transportation service; Betty Kosasky, volunteer visiting; Bernice Royce, phone pals; and Leah Sega-

Wye and wherefore, one week later

As of this writing, there has not yet been an agreement on a revised Wye implementation framework. Since last week, however, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright found her way into the region. Many people have pinned their hopes on her to help broker a revised Wye implementation framework.

But if a new, revised agreement is achieved only through her intervention, it will be a poor augury for the long-lasting permanence of a new relationship between Israel and the Palestinians.

The two sides must find ways to resolve differences by their own resources and goodwill, and not by the resources and cooing encouragement of a mediator.

By all accounts, the key sticking point remains the issue of prisoner release. Israel apparently has agreed to release some 356 prisoners. The Palestinian Authority is demanding the release of 400, including some who have been convicted of murdering Israelis. Israel refuses to accede to this demand.

Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak has said that if a revised Wye cannot be achieved, he will simply revert to the Wye accord as originally signed. The original, unrevised Wye agreement contemplates the release of approximately 100 Palestinian prisoners.

While Yasser Arafat keeps looking over his left shoulder towards the rejectionists and violent Islamic radicals, he is blind to what is right in front of him: the possibility of a new era with the people of Israel.

Setting a new example

On the very day last week that the special committee established by Prime Minister Barak to consider the issue of drafting yeshiva students and chaired by retired Supreme Court Justice Zvi Tal held its first meeting, a group of 50 haredi soldiers was inducted into the army. It was the second such group to be formed. Both groups serve in Nahal units along the border.

The induction was received with quiet satisfaction on the part of the government and military establishment. The IDF announced that there will be an entire haredi battalion by next summer. Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh said that the induction of these young soldiers proves that "it is feasible for haredim to serve in active service and maintain their ultra-Orthodox life style."

According to Rabbi Yoel Schwartz of Yeshivat Dvar Yerushalayim in Jerusalem, nearly twice as many young haredim sign up for duty than are actually inducted. But half don't make it into the army due to reasons of unsuitability or family pressure.

Two haredi units in the IDF may be a modest contribution to the army's personnel needs, but it is an example of common purpose and common sacrifice that bodes well for the future.

Let Holocaust survivor walk in peace

I am a Holocaust survivor. When I came to Canada 50 years ago, I found my home, my dream come true. I love Canada.

When I read about attacks on seniors, Holocaust survivors, (CJN, Aug. 26) I was shocked and felt afraid to go out shopping or take a walk.

I am a senior in my 80s. It is very hard for me to go through the terrible hate crimes again and again.

Please, we are civilized people; let's advise all people to do their utmost to stop the outrageous attacks on innocents. Let us be able to live without fear. Let us all help to bring the guilty to justice.

Ahoy, mates, keep an eye on the mast

I quote from your editorial of Aug. 26:

"It was, and is, difficult work, requiring a strong, firm hand on the judiciary's schooner and a strong, clear eye on the horizon."

I suggest that before embarking on further such metaphors, you take a refresher course on nautical terminology; otherwise, you'll sink like a rudder.

Against ban on Levitts meats

Re: Levitts Kosher Foods case sent to Beit Din. (CJN, Aug. 5)

I find the case of the Kashruth Council of Toronto disallowing Levitts products in stores under their supervision to be, at best, hypocritical. To deny them COR on the grounds that applicants must be shomer Shabbat and to allow stores like No Frills or Dominion to sell COR products is mind boggling. Are the owners of Loblaws or the Oshawa group shomer Shabbat?

I for one will continue to buy only Levitts kosher meat, and if stores under the Council's supervision do not sell this meat, I'm happy to go directly to Levitts in North York (and allow my kids to buy their hot dogs at Canada's Wonderland).

I commend Morton Katz for standing up for his rights and for looking after his customers. Maybe some others could learn a lesson or two.

Opposes statements about Polish rabbi

Your newspaper is very careful to warn those who write letters to the editor not to make sweeping claims against persons which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. That is why I was surprised that you permitted Rabbi Dow Marmur (CJN, Aug. 19) the statement about the former rabbi of the Warsaw congregation. Rabbi Marmur writes that Rabbi Joskovicz "has embarrassed them [his members] with his bad Polish and lack of savoir faire."

To publicly accuse a rabbi of embarrassing his congregation comes under the prohibition of lashon hara if true. Furthermore, how does Rabbi Marmur know that the congregation was embarrassed? Did they all have a pained look on their faces?

I believe Rabbi Marmur owes Rabbi Joskowicz a public apology.

Rabbi Mordechai Bulua
Montreal

Editor's Note: In legitimate journalistic fashion, Rabbi Dow Marmur was expressing a personal opinion.

Need courses for female day school grads

I have read with interest the article on Jewish education for women in Toronto (CJN, July 15), and the correspondence thereon. Without a doubt, in Toronto we are privileged to have many fine institutions where girls can study Judaic studies.

I was very fortunate that my parents generously gave me and my siblings a wonderful Jewish day school education. This education was the greatest gift and I enjoyed it immensely while I was in school.

The concern I have with Jewish education for women in Toronto is that once one has completed day school in this city, there do not appear to be opportunities to continue studying at an appropriately advanced level. Any courses or lectures I have encountered assume that participants have little prior Jewish educational knowledge, or claim that they can teach satisfactorily to classes with a mix of students – some with little background, some with extensive backgrounds.

Surely with so many female graduates from day schools, there should be opportunities for studying, where it is understood that all the participants have completed a day school education, have a strong background in text, have studied in Hebrew and love Talmud! I have not encountered this type of program here in Toronto, but I would love to be proven wrong.

Miriam Snowbell-Buckler
Toronto

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures. Letters sent by e-mail must also include the sender's municipal address.

Perspectives

Rosh Hashanah curiosities of time long past

In his unpublished manuscript, The Many Colours of Canadian Jewish Festivals, historian David Rome noted the following observations about Rosh Hashanah in Montreal in the early years of this century.

An interesting phenomenon marked Canadian streets for many decades. Some time before the High Holy Days, signs would sprout in the areas of Jewish settlement, often with the traditional passage, "to hear the song and the prayer," offering tickets for Holy Day services in halls rented for the purpose.

Cantor Abraham Cantor, formerly of the Austro-Hungarian Congregation, conducted High Holy Day services in the spacious Standard Hall, assisted by a good choir. Tickets were available at 50 cents from Mr. Cantor at 478 St. Charles Borromée St. and Mr. Pascal at 91 Craig St.

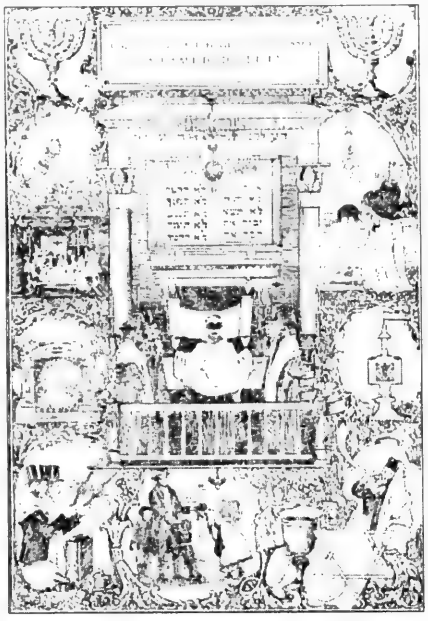
The services were sponsored by private citizens as commercial ventures. At times, the locale was grotesquely unsuited, for example, a Romanian cabaret restaurant with wall paintings appropriate for its year-round purpose, and not at all for reverent synagogue services.

There is a good deal of significance in these arrangements. They tell us, among other things, that formal synagogue space did not suffice for all who desired to pray on Rosh Hashanah. Where did these worshippers pray the rest of the year, even on Passover, Sukkot or Shavuot, not to mention the Sabbath?

If the phenomenon indicated a measure of agnosticism or atheism, it is also a reminder that many who were not so strictly observant, nevertheless felt impelled by the traditional force inherent in those days of worship to attend services at Rosh Hashanah.

It is also a reminder that many of the newcomers were not sufficiently attracted to the organized congregations to become associated with them regularly.

Later, in due course, mainly after World War II, for a variety of social and historic reasons, there emerged the consolidated, well organized, architecturally impressive, suburban synagogues of today. Sometimes their long, hyphenated names trace their roots in the rented rooms over the dairy or clothing stores of the immigrant settlements of the early 1900s.



A typical New Year's greeting card of an earlier era.

One of the historic structures that was mobilized for this use was the Monument National, erected by the Société St-Jean-Baptiste, the old French Canadian patriotic society, as a monument to the national sentiment of this people. A unique, beloved temple sacred to two nations and faiths: the Monument National was the platform for Armand Lavergne, for Henri Bourassa, for Lionel Groulx; and it was the scene of patriotic manifestations and the celebration of French theatre and literature; it was also graced by the presence of Chaim Weizmann, Nahum Sokolov and Menachem Begin.

The hospitality which the ancient society extended to its Jewish neighbors turned it into a virtual monument for the Québécois Jewish society as well as for the Québécois nation.

So we are surprised to read in the French-language newspaper Les Débats on Sept. 30, 1900, over a heading consisting of puzzled question marks, "Where are we going, Great God? Where are we heading?

"The officers of the Association St-Jean Baptiste last spring refused the free use of the Monument National Theatre to a group of young French Canadians who wished to put on a show for the benefit of the victims of the fire at Hull and at Ottawa. Now the successors of [Ludger] Duvernay have shown that the association has degenerated.

"Last week I saw a Hebrew sign with the name of a Mr. Rabinsky, announcing 'Services on the First and Second Days.'

"I went upstairs and found several hundred Jews celebrating their Rosh Hashanah before a sort of altar decorated with patriotic symbols. One of the elders of the tribe politely asked me to keep my head covered; he told me that the officers of the association had rented the hall to the Jews, as they had last year, on condition that this not be announced in the press.

"I believed him readily," wrote Stanislas Prud'homme, "but as I left, I decided to put this before the eyes of my people. If there is one place not to be rented for a price to the Jews, it is surely the Monument National. If there is anything not to be rented for a price to the Jews for the celebration of their religious festivals, it is the décor of our national hall.

"Who can assure us that next July, the anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne, will not be celebrated in the St. Lawrence Street theatre by the Orangemen?"

From the first issues of the Kanader Adler in 1907, we learn that High Holy Day services in the Monument National were sponsored by Mr. L. Mitnik, one of the founders of the Yiddish theatre in Canada.

The cantor was assisted by a choir. Nurses were caring for little children in an adjoining room so that young mothers could participate in the religious services.

L. Mitnik, Yiddish theatrical impresario, again rented the Monument National to conduct High Holy Day services with cantor Benjamin Rosen and his choir. Mothers were urged to attend; their young babies were cared for by a nurse. Tickets at $1 to $2 were available at the Adler, at the Ezra Book Store next door and in the grocery store at 85 Dorchester W.

Rev. Kaplansky advertised in the Adler of Nov. 1, 1908 for "Choristers: sopranos, altos and tenors with good voices. Good salary; opportunity to learn music. Apply at 1489 St. Dominique St."

As in previous years, he conducted New Year's services in 1912 with a choir of 18 singers at the Monument National, under the management of L. Mitnik and the sponsorship of the King Edward Society. Tickets at $1 to $2.50.

A.B. Bennett, one of the founders of the Canadian Jewish Congress and editor of the Canadian Jewish Times in his college days, wrote in 1912:

"The present season of the year brings to the surface the perennial question of the sacrilege committed by some people in exploiting the High Holy Days for business ends by converting dancing halls, shop lofts, and vacant stores into places of worship. We feel a repugnance for men who play upon the religious feelings of their fellow Jews for their personal aggrandizement. The promoters of the 'temporary abodes of God' do not engage the cantors and the choirs and buy or rent the holy scrolls merely for the joy of affording pious Jews a place to commune with their Maker.

"There is a season for everything. There is a time for dancing, and for theatre-going, and for cloak manufacturing. And there is also a special time for praying, and for worshipping. And just as there are individuals whose business it is to cater to the demand for dancing, for theatrical performances, and for cloaks, there are also individuals who think that they can well make it their business to cater to the yearning for religious expression which is aroused by the advent of the Yamim Nora'im. Religion is thus purely a business proposition.

"The fact that the supply of synagogical space increases at this time bespeaks a necessary increase in the demand for it. There are Jews who are only Yamim Nora'im Jews. But on Rosh Hashanah and on Yom Kippur, they are prepared to make a great sacrifice for the sake of their ancestral faith, and they actually betake themselves to some place where they can indulge the necessary religious exercises.

"These makeshift places of worship are really needed to meet the contingency of the rising of the religious spirit. The question then strikes one: Is it also necessary that these additional accommodations should be managed by individuals for personal gain? The New York Kehillah has given an answer to this question. The Kehillah in that city has decided, in order to prevent the sacrilege of the exploitation of the holidays, to open places of worship under its own control. The step it has taken is one in the right direction." (Sept. 25, 1912)

The Canadian Jewish Times described the 1913 "praying booths" as follows:

"There appears to be an increase in these temporary 'synagogues,' the existence of which is to be noted at every two blocks in the Main Street vicinity. There are 'synagogues' fixed up in flats and in stores, while others on a bigger scale are to be found in vaudeville halls and theatres. Glaring posters advertising the particular attraction of the 'services' conducted at each synagogue, appear on the walls of the neighborhood. In one of these theatres, the services for the High Festivals are advertised as being conducted under a certain 'management.' Another of the services to be held in a store near Duluth Avenue, is advertised as being a branch of a nearby synagogue (an evidence of a little extra congregational enterprise).

"When all this is observed, a very unpleasant impression is created, for there is no other denomination which uses such methods in its religious worship. The whole process of organizing these holy services on a commercial basis is as distasteful to the esthetic sense as it is harmful to our religion. Especially is it bad for our youth, who are apt to lose their respect for the beautiful festival services when they see them made a business.

"It is, no doubt, true that there is not sufficient room in the synagogues for all the Jews in Montreal who desire to pray on the Holy Festivals, but surely some method should be instituted by the community to utilize certain buildings suitable for prayer. From year to year, the temporary synagogues during the High Holy Days grow like mushrooms, yet no attempt has ever been made to meet this state of affairs.

"It is here where the lack of a Kehillah in Montreal is very much felt. Had we a Kehillah, it would be its duty to make the necessary arrangements to afford every Jew an opportunity of attending services during the High Holy Days and thus do away with the commercial aspect of our festival services."

Opinions

Variations on an old theme

With the High Holy Days approaching and Selichot putting us into a mood of self-examination, I feel moved to return to an old theme. I asked myself what is it that we as Jews could do better. Naturally, we should all become more Jewish in the best sense of the word: more aware of the presence of God, more literate, more supportive of communal goals, more charitable, and so on. Something of this catalogue applies to everyone in some measure.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Being Jewish also means to be better citizens. Unfortunately, many of us have fallen into the trap of listening to a xenophobic minority. It wants us to believe that refugees and immigrants are bad for Canada and, in support of this opinion, promotes a series of myths. We have the obligation to know what they are, lest we commit the sin of indifference by believing certain myths.

The Canadian Council for Refugees, of which I am a member, has recently put out a little pamphlet that lists some of these myths. Consider the following two:

Myth #1: Canada receives more than its share of refugees.

Fact: Many other Western countries accept more refugee claimants than Canada, both in absolute numbers and per capita. Those that do better than we, are Germany, the United Kingdom, The Netherlands and even Switzerland. The number of refugees Canada accepts each year is less than one-tenth of one percent of our population.

Myth #2: Refugees who come to Canada using false documents are bogus refugees.

Fact: Many refugees fleeing life-threatening persecution obtain a false travel document as the only means of escape. Often, their home governments refuse to issue passports to known political dissidents, or imprison them if they apply. The fact that a claimant used a false document tells us nothing about whether the person is a refugee or not.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights says in Article 14:

"Everyone has the right to seek and enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution."

We should be grateful rather than critical that we have the opportunity of living in a land that offers asylum. We do not wander the streets afraid to be spotted by the police or by soldiers rounding the corner selecting us for ethnic cleansing.

At High Holy Day time, the opportunity to review one's attitude towards strangers in our midst beckons us urgently. Let us take advantage of it and, as Jews who know what it means to be strangers in a strange land, we have a double obligation to be fair and welcoming. I would like to think that this is what God would want us to do and the Torah repeats it a number of times: "You shall befriend the stranger in your midst, for you yourselves were strangers once in the land of Egypt."

Mobile madness: Israel cells out

Returning home to Israel from a visit abroad – especially an extended one – is never a casual experience. Emotions are intense, while impressions are mixed. The process begins literally as your plane lands at Ben-Gurion Airport. At the sound of the plane's wheels hitting the tarmac, many passengers – particularly if it's an El Al flight – break out in hearty applause, presumably for the crew, for ensuring a successful journey.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

That's only the beginning.

No less telling is what happens after you disembark from the plane and are bused to the main terminal. Within seconds of entering the building to stand in line for passport control, many people reach into their handbags and whip out cellphones. Oblivious to their fellow travellers, they quickly demonstrate the unmistakable Israeli gift of the gab. Before you know it, you're downwind of a cacophony of loud, one-sided conversations.

Welcome home. This is the modern telltale sign that you've arrived in Israel. Until your next flight out, there'll be no escaping cellphones. They're everywhere, their presence felt often in the most unwelcome manner. Talk about a ringing success! Israel's mania for mobiles shows no limits, as almost 40 percent of Israelis now carry cellphones (most of them don't know when to turn them off). Experts estimate this will jump to 50 percent within 18 months, as models become even smaller and more sophisticated.

During my recent stay in North America, cellphones were surprisingly far less conspicuous than in Israel. It was a relief not to see every second or third person walking around, head tilted, mind elsewhere, with a device hooked to his or her ear and jabbering away in a great fury.

Israel enjoys the dubious distinction of having one of the highest per-capita rates of cellphone ownership in the world. Pretty soon, if current purchasing patterns continue, Israel will rival Finland for international cellular supremacy. But Israelis don't only possess these devices in great numbers, they wear them proudly – and use them incessantly, no matter where they are. Studies show that Israelis spend up to three times as many minutes on cellphones as users in other countries.

Of course, it's not the sight of cellphones that's so disturbing, but rather their pervasive use. Like many other cell-less citizens, I'm a frequent victim of cellphone rage, the condition brought on by a specific type of noise pollution otherwise known as high-decibel chatter spoken into a cordless piece of plastic. Then there's that ringing, the insistent vrrring of the cellphone that interrupts meals, meetings, movies, concerts, press conferences, sporting events and simple conversations. I'm not sure what's more disturbing – the ringing or the often-boisterous, inane yackety-yack bystanders must then endure.

In Israel, there's little refuge from cellphone abuse. I'm constantly seeking a no-phone zone that doesn't seem to exist. Nothing seems to keep Israelis from their cellular devices. They use them shamelessly, hollering into them, disturbing the peace with wanton disregard in parks, offices, theatres, buses, elevators, washrooms, shopping malls, hospitals, and... Yes, I've even been at a cemetery, when, sure enough, a ringing cellphone pierced the solemn silence of the funeral.

Going to a cafe or restaurant invariably leaves me fantasizing about the pre-cellular days when people went out to drink or eat and talk to those actually at the table. Just the other day, I went out for lunch with a friend – and his cellphone. It rang four times during our meal.

One place you'd think to find solace from cellphone abuse is in cars, as it's against the law in Israel to use them while driving. You'd never know it from what you see on the roads. As is the case with countless other traffic laws, many people could care less, knowing police rarely go after offenders.

OK, I admit cell phones are great for emergencies and for parents to give to their children for safety reasons. But there's a price, given what is potentially the greatest menace of these devices.

Turns out gabbing away on cellphones may not be such a carefree act after all. Increasingly, researchers cite health risks, notably cancer, associated with exposure to the electromagnetic radiation generated by cellphones. But surely cell-less souls like me at least don't have anything to worry about.

Not so fast. Wouldn't you know it! As I returned home from the airport, I noticed that in my absence something had been added to the roof of a building on my block. One of the mobile phone companies had installed one of those controversial cellular transmitters – considered a major source of electromagnetic radiation. Welcome home.

Lessons from an earthquake

The massive earthquake that hit Turkey in mid-August also shook Israel, figuratively, if not physically. The sight of the utter devastation in the towns around Istanbul, and the many thousands of people killed, injured and left homeless, were chilling. Israel, which has developed a close military and political relationship with Turkey, empathized immediately.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The Israeli army immediately sent rescue teams to help search for survivors (sadly, Israelis have become the best in the world at this task), and set up a field hospital next to the ruins of a hospital destroyed by the quake.

Thousands of individuals sent blankets, sleeping bags, food and other essential supplies, and special bank accounts were opened for donations.

This was another chance for Israel to fulfil the biblical commandment to be a light unto the nations by helping to save lives, and illustrated some of the very positive aspects of Israeli society.

The proximity was a major factor in the impact of this tragedy on Israel. Turkey is an hour away by air (a few hours journey by car or bus, if we could drive through Lebanon and Syria). Many Israelis have taken vacations there, and dozens were caught in Turkey when the quake hit. Some did not survive.

We share many things with the Turks, including a western democratic system of government, caught in a very undemocratic Middle East. Both peoples struggle with the need to balance the preservation of a very rich and ancient religious and cultural heritage with the homogenizing pressures of modern secular society. Watching the scenes from Turkey, Israelis were struck by the realization that a disaster of this magnitude could also happen here.

Every year, on Yom Kippur, at one of the most sacred moments of the holiest day of the year, in the Unetaneh Tokef prayer, we recall that it is up to the almighty to determine who shall live, and who shall die, who through starvation, who by fire, and who in an earthquake.

This ancient prayer, recited in Jerusalem over 2000 years ago, reflected real fears. The land of Israel, including Jerusalem, has been struck by earthquakes periodically throughout history.

An active geological fault, known as the Jordan Rift (which is part of the much larger Syrian-East African Rift) goes along the Jordan River, from Metulla to Eilat.

The prophets have a number of references to devastating earthquakes. Safed was destroyed over one hundred years ago, and a major earthquake struck in the area of Jerusalem and the Dead Sea in 1927. A few years ago, a moderate tremor shook the residents of Jerusalem and damaged some of the hotels in Eilat.

The helplessness we feel in an earthquake is a poignant reminder of the fragility of life, and the illusion that somehow, we are in control.

Technological progress and scientific advancement have not changed this basic aspect of the human condition, and during the High Holy Days, when every Jew is commanded to make an accounting for his and her deeds and misdeeds, both individually and communally, this reminder is appropriate.

While there is no defence against earthquakes, except prayer, there are some measures that can be taken to minimize the deaths and suffering.

In Turkey, the damage was compounded by ineptness and corruption. While this tremor was not entirely unexpected, large apartment complexes and entire neighborhoods were built right on top of the faultline.

Although Turkey's building codes include provisions for earthquake-resistant construction, these regulations were ignored by greedy contractors, who paid off the corrupt officials in charge of enforcement. Thousands of people paid for this with their lives.

Could this scene be repeated in Israel? Israelis like to think that they are more advanced, and that the government functions more efficiently.

However, there are lingering doubts. In a country where the tradition of baksheesh (petty bribery) and much larger corruption has not been eliminated, such scenes cannot be ruled out.

After decades of scandals, the Israeli public's faith in the big construction companies, and in the ministries and building inspectors who are supposed to keep them honest, is quite low. The scale is not as bad as in Turkey, or any other part of the Middle East, but this is one area in which Israelis have much to learn from North Americans

Taking a step back from the daily concerns of Israelis, the earthquake in Turkey is a sobering reminder – a disaster that struck too close to home, in a country, which is in many ways similar to ours. This year, during the Yom Kippur prayers, many Israelis will be contemplating the lessons.

The Kirshner File

Rabbi Kelman fights for religious pluralism

Pluralism, egalitarianism and tolerance are not merely words for Naamah Kelman, but philosophic imperatives.

Kelman, the first woman to be ordained as a rabbi in Israel, is in the forefront of a bitter struggle which, if won, will doubtless transform the face and body politic of the Jewish state. "We're trying to build a new Israeli liberal Judaism," said Rabbi Kelman, a Reform Jew who has lived in Israel since 1976. "We hope it will emerge."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

With the implicit backing of the Supreme Court, she and her colleagues in the Reform and Conservative movements are fighting for official status and recognition as legitimate branches of Judaism. They want nothing less than the right to perform weddings and burials, grant divorces and, last but not least, carry out conversions so that their converts may be recognized as Jews under the Law of Return.

These functions are currently monopolized by Orthodox rabbis and enshrined by the "status quo" agreement reached by Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, with the Orthodox rabbinate.

Rabbi Kelman, director of Israel's first Reform yeshiva, contends that the Orthodox movement has abused its power by denying Israelis freedom of choice. "Everyone should be able to take their rightful place in Israel," she said. "Let Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Judaism flourish."

Rabbi Kelman, who hails from a long line of rabbis and whose brother Levi is also a rabbi, claims that Haredim have total contempt for Reform Judaism and the Supreme Court (which has issued a series of landmark rulings from representation on religious councils to draft deferments for yeshiva students).

"It's sad," she mused. "There is a lot of beauty in ultra-Orthodoxy. But politics has corrupted them and made them hateful. Their fear of Reform Jewry is unbelievable. We challenge their religious authority. We represent a threat. We symbolize modernity. They're afraid of anything that will crack their closed, repressive system. They project their fears on the modern world.

"I don't hate them," she added. "I struggle every day to maintain my love for Klal Yisrael. Yet I'm disgusted by the marriage of religion and politics in Israel and saddened by the growing extremism and divisiveness."

For all the hostility displayed by the Orthodox rabbinate toward her movement, Rabbi Kelman takes solace from her conviction that Reform Judaism is becoming "the denomination of choice" for an increasing number of Israelis.

Rabbi Kelman's Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism is affiliated with the World Union for Progressive Judaism, whose roots are in 19th-century Germany but whose headquarters are now in Jerusalem. Today, the movement has about 1.5 million congregants in almost 40 countries, and is particularly strong in the United States and Canada.

In Israel, Reform Judaism is catching on. The first Reform synagogue, Congregation Har El in Jerusalem, was founded in 1958. Several years later, the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, with which Rabbi Kelman is associated, opened its campus on King David Street in Jerusalem.

There are currently 20 Progressive shuls in Haifa, Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, six of which are housed in synagogue buildings. "We have about 5,000 dues-paying members, and 10,000 worshipers on High Holy Days." The figures, she pointed out, are deceptive, as only a very small proportion of Israeli Jews belong to a synagogue. "That's a Diaspora idea."

Since 1982, when Israel's first Reform rabbi was ordained, 16 men and four women have received smichah from the Hebrew Union College. Rabbi Kelman herself was ordained in 1992.

Rabbi Naamah Kelman

Apart from its synagogues, Progressive Judaism has a network of schools, educational and community centres, a youth movement, and Hebrew and English Beit Midrash study programs. Rabbi Kelman, whose official title is director of educational initiatives, is in charge of the English program.

In addition, Progressive Judaism has built two kibbutzim in the Negev Desert (Yahel in 1976 and Lotan in 1983) and one settlement in the Galilee (Har Halutz in 1985).

Despite its success in establishing a foothold in Israel, the Reform movement just gets by financially. "Our operating budget," she said, "is the size of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto. It's unbelievable. We're talking about $1 or $2 million [American] dollars."

Progressive Judaism is funded by a coalition of foundations, individuals, the United Jewish Appeal, the Jewish Agency and the Association of Reform Zionists of America.

Rabbi Kelman, 44, was born in New York City. Her father, Wolfe, a Polish Jew, arrived in Toronto as a child. His father, Zvi Yehuda, was an Orthodox rabbi. Wolfe Kelman attended Harbord Collegiate, his father's talmud Torah and the University of Toronto. During World War II, he joined the Royal Air Force. Subsequently, he studied at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary in Manhattan, and was appointed executive director of the Conservative Rabbinical Assembly.

"He didn't remain in the Orthodox world," said Rabbi Kelman, whose uncle, Joseph, was formerly spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Rabbi Kelman was brought up as a Conservative Jew, though her mother's brother was a Reform rabbi. "I grew up with a strong sense of options," she noted.

A feminist, she studied at the University of Pennsylvania, hoping to be involved in community work and teaching. Having settled in Israel, she took a degree in social work at Bar-Ilan University. Then it was on to the Hebrew University for an MA from the Hebrew University's Institute of Contemporary Jewry.

"I went to Israel with the intention of staying a couple of years," she explained. Her plans changed when she met her husband-to-be, a helicopter pilot named Elan Ezrachi, who has since gone into the field of Jewish education, and with whom she has had three children.

Raised to marry a rabbi, she decided to study for the rabbinate in 1981, when only Reform Judaism ordained women and the Conservative movement was still wary of such ordinations.

Rabbi Kelman's father, a champion of women's rights and interfaith dialogue, encouraged her, but warned her of the difficulties of being a rabbi of her gender in Israel. She persevered, becoming the Hebrew Union College's first female graduate. "There wasn't much of a reaction from the Orthodox," she recalled dryly.

A warm, friendly person who dresses informally and favors an embroidered Sephardi yarmulke, Rabbi Kelman doubts whether the new Israeli government, headed by Prime Minister Ehud Barak, will tinker with the status quo in religious affairs. "Israeli politics today reflects yesterday's agenda," she observed. "Barak won't make far-reaching changes. He wants to be Mr. Consensus."

She did not vote for Barak's One Israel movement, but for Meretz, which, she thinks, is "the only Israeli party which has consistently fought for peace and pluralism."

Rabbi Kelman, who supports civil marriage, a loosening of Sabbath restrictions and a separation of synagogue and state, is convinced that the status quo will ultimately have to be revised. "Judaism has survived," she said, "because of its ability to adapt and be moderate."

UJC's Ain balances time between Toronto, U.S.

Last week The CJN ran an article focusing on the role of UIA Federations Canada. This week: a discussion with Steve Ain about his work at United Jewish Communities in New York and about his role here.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If it's Thursday, this must be...Toronto.

Ever since Steve Ain became interim chief operating officer of the New York-based United Jewish Communities earlier this summer, he's been dividing his time between the United States and Toronto in a 60:40 split.

Ain continues to serve as executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada two days a week. The balance of his work week is spent as interim chief operating officer of the New York-based United Jewish Communities (UJC), a recent (spring 1999) merger of three national American organizations: United Jewish Appeal, the Council of Jewish Federations and United Israel Appeal of America.

The link between the two organizations is as follows: UIA Federations Canada was the result of a merger last year between United Israel Appeal Canada and the Council of Jewish Federations Canada (the Canadian arm of the Council of Jewish Federations).

All Canadian federations were members of the Council of Jewish Federations, which no longer exists as a separate entity. Thus all Canadian federations are members of the United Jewish Communities.

When it comes to transferring a portion of the money raised by Jewish community federations to Israel or overseas, however, the two countries have independent systems.

Ain's two roles occasionally overlap. This month, for example, he will wear both professional hats at a planning conference for the Jewish Agency.

There isn't overlap, however, in terms of campaign assistance. UIA Federations Canada helps the campaigns of individual Canadian federations, providing programming, for example, and recently it co-sponsored a national campaign video.

In New York, Ain and his colleagues are "trying to get things up and running" until a permanent chief professional is hired.

In addition to maintaining the services formerly provided by the three original national organizations, hundreds of positions on the new organization's governance committees must be filled, Ain explained in a recent interview at his UIA Federations Canada office here.

His involvement in the Canadian merger that created UIA Federations Canada was not the reason he was sought out for the American position, he said.

"I was asked to go down there because I guess I'm one of the few people around who has senior experience both at the federation level and at the national level," Ain said, adding that he also has extensive overseas experience.

Steve Ain

A native of Montreal with a 29-year career in Jewish communal service (most of it in Toronto), Ain has served, among other roles, as assistant national director of Canadian Jewish Congress, campaign director of United Jewish Appeal and executive director of the Toronto Federation, as it was known in the mid-1980s.

Why did he take on such a demanding new position?

From a practical standpoint, he was able to. Maxyne Finkelstein, who will replace him at UIA Federations Canada next June, is already on board as executive director and is shouldering a "huge chunk of responsibility," said Ain.

But his personal reason is, "I guess, a loyalty to the system. I believe in the UJA federations system and what we do. I believe in our overseas partners, the Jewish Agency and the Joint Distribution Committee.

"Somebody said, 'You can make a difference in this [new agency]. You can get this up and running.' Lots of people couldn't say yes. Somebody who's executive of a large-city federation, and doesn't have the backup, the luxury of a Maxyne Finkelstein, can't say yes, even if they want to."

Of course, noted Ain, technology helps. "When I'm in New York, my e-mail is forwarded here. When I'm here, I can access my New York e-mail. I can do Canadian conference calls from New York and New York calls from Toronto."

The American organization is much larger than UIA Federations Canada, with a staff of close to 200 in New York and just over 100, spread among five regional offices: Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, New Jersey and Florida.

Both mergers were the result of a desire for greater control by the individual federations, said Ain.

The task was much easier in Canada because of the relatively small size of the two parent organizations compared to their U.S. counterparts. UIA Canada had annual revenues in the area of $35 million, and CJF Canada had national expenditures of about $400,000, Ain said.

What are the benefits to the Canadian Jewish community now that the merger has been in effect over a year?

"I hope the communities will feel a more direct connection to the national organization, because they control us," said Ain. "The vast majority of our board of directors is appointed directly by the federations themselves. We hope they'll feel a more direct connection to what we do overseas."

The flip side is that "it's very hard to run an organization if your board of directors sit not as members of the board of UIA Federations Canada, but as the representative from Winnipeg or the representative from Ottawa, because their first loyalty isn't to you."

To encourage a broad vision, the organization has taken a number of leadership groups overseas to see the work it funds in the former Soviet Union and in Israel. "It takes time," Ain said. "I think we're well on the road."

In New York, he's at the beginning of a similar journey.

Shaar Shalom Synagogue Welcomes New Cantor

25 YEARS

On August 1st Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill officially welcomed Cantor David Harel and his family to the North Toronto Jewish community.

Cantor Harel began studying Chazanut in Israel in 1971 and most recently served as Chazan at one of the leading synagogues in Montreal, the Chevra Kaddisha. He has also served in Johannesburg, Birmingham (England) and Israel.

Cantor Harel joins Rabbi Martin Berman as an integral member of the clergy. While his main responsibility will be that of leading services, he will also participate in pastoral duties, Bar/Bat Mitzvah teaching, advising the Hebrew school in liturgy appreciation from a musical perspective, and programming with other synagogue groups. Shaar Shalom's participatory services will be enhanced by the warmth and richness of Cantor Harel's davening.

Shaar Shalom Synagogue, which this year celebrates its 25th anniversary, is a conservative congregation and member of USCJ. It offers full weekday, Shabbat and holiday services. Along with a dynamic multi-tiered youth program, it boasts an active Sisterhood and Brotherhood as well as a comprehensive afternoon Hebrew School curriculum from senior kindergarten to grade 8.

Shaar Shalom Synagogue is open to new membership and welcomes inquiries. For information call 905-889-4975.

Immigrant photographers document Toronto shuls

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — When Andrew and Paul Laszlo lived in Budapest, they were the official photographers for the Hungarian Jewish community.

The Hungarian-born twin brothers documented most of the significant events affecting Hungarian Jewry from about 1978 to 1988, among them, the World Jewish Congress meeting of 1987, the first congress held in a Communist country.

And when there were anti-Semitic incidents, the brothers were called. "We took pictures of the desecration of the cemeteries, in Budapest and in deserted far-away villages," Paul said. "I remember seeing the bones so clearly...We have all the negatives. All these pictures are in a box, filed and dated."

Carefully preserving these contemporary historical events, the Laszlo brothers, 44, said they knew they were making a valuable contribution to the community they left behind in 1988. They closed their photography studio and left Hungary that year, immigrating to Canada in 1989.

Now established in Toronto, Paul and Andrew have found a way to use their photographic talents to make a contribution to the Toronto

For Over 75 Years Bank Hapoalim Has Been Serving Its Clients

Without Changing Our Name or Our Devotion to Superior Service.

In the world of private banking, stability is a precious attribute. While many other banks have changed their name and their character in recent decades, Bank Hapoalim has remained solid, steady and sound.

That doesn't mean we haven't changed. Indeed, we are continually enhancing our private banking, trust and investment capabilities, and refining our sophisticated technological systems.

As the world's largest Israeli bank, we take seriously our obligation to provide clients with world-class services. The banking world may continue to change, but our name, our values, and our commitment to clients endure.

Synagogue project a labor of love for brothers

Jewish community. This year they embarked on a project to photograph all the synagogues in the city, taking all kinds of pictures with video, digital and traditional equipment.

And they're doing this project, which they call a labor of love, during their spare time. Not that they have that much time to spare. Both brothers have families and work full-time – Paul, the father of two, is in property management and Andrew, the father of three, works in sales at Henry's camera store.

They also run a business together on weekends and evenings – Twin Photo and Video – providing video and still photography for simchahs and other private events as well as individual and family portraits. And it was through this business that they fell into the synagogue project.

Hired as videographers for a wedding this past February, the brothers discovered the Anshei Minsk congregation; they were very taken with the 70-year-old synagogue on St. Andrews Street in Kensington Market, Andrew said.

Digital camera

"We were so amazed by the shul we started to play with the digital camera. We were so impressed. We took 200 pictures of the shul itself like details of the cornerstone. We said we have to come back to take more pictures.

"We thought it [the shul] was something really special. It was very European. There are some very nice shuls [in other parts of Toronto], but they're not the same style as the really old shuls [downtown]."

From the Minsker shul they went on to photograph the other downtown synagogues, the Kiever Shul on Bellevue Avenue and the First Narayever Congregation on Brunswick Avenue.

Paul said they fell in love with the Knesseth Israel, better known as the Junction Shul, on Maria Street in the west end of the city. "We went at 9 o'clock in the evening. It's the nicest shul."

"To walk into the Junction Shul, I could hardly wait to go back again," he said. "I want to take my father (he's visiting from Hungary to attend Paul's son's bar mitzvah) to see it. That shul is on top of our list. It's very pretty."

So far the Laszlos have photographed some 20 synagogues and racked up thousands of pictures in different formats and they're thinking of extending their work to some of the smaller Ontario towns, they said.

The project would make a lovely book, Paul mused. "It will be a nice collection of pictures...We feel lucky that our job is our hobby. It's a hobby and a profession at the same time."

"Even if we are not the official photographers, we're thinking of the future," Andrew said. "We try to think ahead. What we do now hopefully will be appreciated in the future – to give the future generation an idea of what exists now."

Reunion for Burma Bombers

TORONTO — Members of the famed "Burma Bombers" – Allied airmen who fought the Japanese in southeast Asia during World War II – will gather for a reunion in Toronto Oct. 1 to 3.

The Burma Bombers Association began among Canadian crews of B-24 Liberator bombers, but quickly grew to include all Air Force veterans of the war's India-Burma theatre. Today, veterans of the South-East Asia Command (SEAC) are from Canada, the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand.

In addition to reminiscing, those at the reunion will pay tribute to the 454 Canadian airmen who were killed, and today lie in war cemeteries in Rangoon, Singapore, Ranchi and Taukkyan.

It's estimated that half of the 1,000 or so airmen who flew Liberators were members of the Royal Canadian Air Force or were Canadians in Royal Air Force squadrons.

It was mainly Canadians who destroyed the real-life bridge on the river Kwai at Kanchanaburi, in Thailand.

Toronto Burma campaign veteran Nathan Kaufman informs The CJN that Canadians would have played a predominant role in the planned invasion of Malaya in September 1945. The plan was aborted following the dropping of atom bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki a month before.

The Far East campaign is often described as "the forgotten war," eclipsed by the European and Pacific theatres, Kaufman states. Yet Britain's 14th Army in Burma was the largest single army on either side during the war, and Japan suffered more casualties in Burma and Malaya than in all other theatres combined, he notes.

Reunions of the Burma Bombers have been held every two years, and have taken place in several Canadian cities. This will mark the first time it will happen in Toronto.

For information, call reunion organizer Larry Wynn at 416-239-1511, or George Hosegood, president of the Burma Bombers, at 807-475-7480.

HI UJA, I'M ANSWERING THE CALL

That's all you have to say, in order to qualify for fabulous prizes when your UJA Federation campaigner calls. We'll be conducting Campaign 2000 telethons four times this year, starting September 13-16. During every telethon week, when you pick up the phone by saying "Hi, UJA, I'm answering the call," and increase your UJA gift, your name will go into a draw for wonderful rewards. But the biggest reward is knowing that your donation will change Jewish lives forever. So answer the call to assist thousands of Jews in need and answer the call to win. After all, winning has a nice ring to it.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Time to wake from bad habits

We all think we're experts on the topic of sin. We don't need definitions of what sin is; we know it when we see it. Sin is doing what our mothers tell us not to do; sin is what those TV preachers talk about on Sunday mornings; sin is the subplot of our favorite soap opera.

While these may be good examples of sin, our overall definition of sin is often cartoonish and one-dimensional. We may know a lot about sins that are bad actions; However, we know very little about sins that are bad attitudes.

There is a story told about the late dean of Yeshivas Chaim Berlin, Rav Yitzchak Hutner. He asked one of his students to choose which are the worst two sins in the Torah. The student thought for a while, and gave an answer. Rav Hutner rejected the answer, and the student thought about the question again, and came back with a different answer. Again, Rav Hutner rejected the answer. This cycle repeated itself several times, until Rav Hutner told the curious student: "The two greatest sins in the world are mediocrity and foolishness."

What an insightful answer! We often lose sight of the connection between our attitudes and our actions, our feelings and our failings. Most of our shortcomings can be traced to these two cardinal sins, the sin of foolishness and the sin of mediocrity.

Of these two, it is the sin of mediocrity that interests me at the moment. Is it wrong if someone chooses to take it easy? Must we all be dynamic, type-A strivers?

In short, the answer to these two questions, is yes. Yes, it is wrong to be complacent. Yes, we must constantly strive for spiritual growth. The great Rabbi Hillel said that we must either "grow or die" (Avot 1:13).

Life is a precious gift, intended to be used to the fullest. If we refuse to improve ourselves, if we settle for mediocrity, we become one of the living dead, a person who is squandering the gift of life.

With this insight, we get a better understanding of repentance.

Repentance is not merely a response to sin, but rather a war against mediocrity. It is the process of changing attitudes, of no longer accepting the status quo. Repentance demands spiritual growth and improvement, no matter what level a person is at.

It is for this reason that Maimonides (Tshuvah 3:4) compares the shofar blast to a wake-up call, telling the slumbering ones to awake.

Throughout the year, we live with the status quo, sleepwalking through our daily routines. The period between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is a time when we wake up from bad habits and stale routines, and reach for greatness. To live with the status quo is to live with mediocrity, and mediocrity is not an option.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz is the spiritual leader of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Montreal.

Insights into the shofar

It is perhaps the most moving moment of Rosh Hashanah. A hush, and then the sounding of the shofar. The shofar is one of Judaism's most famous symbols and is responsible for some of the religion's most profound writings. Today, some insights into the shofar from the Jewish Highway.

Rav Saadiah Gaon gives 10 reasons for blowing the shofar on Rosh Hashanah [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/roshhash/shofar.htm]. Among them: "Rosh Hashanah is the day that commemorates the creation of the world and it is described as the 'coronation' of God. As it is customary to sound a trumpet at a king's coronation so we blow the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. By blowing the shofar, we recognize the 'purpose' of the Creation."

Sue Levi Ellwell, editor of The Jewish Women's Study Guide, says listening to the shofar can teach us something about how to treat each other. "This day is a day of listening, perhaps with a new severity, a renewed attention. Can we listen to one another with the same attention that we accord to the shofar?" [http://www.vjholidays.com/rosh/shoquotes.htm].

For more thoughts on the symbolism of the shofar, see Rabbi Harold Kushner [http://www.uscj.org/NEWENG/NATICK/kushnerrh.htm], Rabbi Harold Schulweis [http://www.vbs.org/rabbi/hshulw/shofar.htm] and Aish HaTorah [http://www.aish.edu/calendar/highholy/shofar.htm].

Virtual Jerusalem has a wonderful mini-site devoted to the shofar [http://www.vjholidays.com/rosh/shofar.htm]. There's a survey of the other times the shofar is sounded, such as for introducing the Jubilee year.

During the Middle Ages, Jews blew the shofar to mark the beginning of the Sabbath or to announce deaths, fasts and even excommunications. And in more recent times, the shofar has been used in Israel at the inauguration of each new president.

For the Jew, the need to hear the shofar can be extremely powerful.

Rabbi Eli Hecht tells the heartbreaking story of how a rabbi risked his life to sound a shofar in Auschwitz for hundreds of doomed children [http://www.shamash.org/listarchives/jewish-music/940831].

And there's the story of how some Conversos, Spanish Jews who officially converted to Christianity, were able to listen to the shofar on Rosh Hashanah without provoking the ire of the Inquisition [http://sephardiconnect.com/Rosh.htm].

I was impressed by a page created by David Bar-Tzur who has tried to represent the sounding of the shofar for people who are deaf [http://www.rit.edu/~dabdis/jush/rh/shofar.html]. "The way I represent the sounding of the shofar is to first fingerspell the type of shofar blast that is called out, then [do the sign for] shofar; that is, the two S hands are held at the mouth. For the tekiah, I bow my head at the beginning of the blast and raise it again as the blast ends."

Everyone knows that a shofar is made from a ram's horn. But horns of some other animals can also be made into shofars. Take a look at the horns of an antelope, ibex, cow and oryx and find out which ones are kosher. [http://www.vjholidays.com/rosh/shofkosh.htm]. Over at the Torahtots site, you can find a Shofar-based puzzle and drawings which you can print out and color [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/rosh/roshclr.htm]

It's not quite like hearing it live, but there are many sites where you can listen to experts sound the shofar on the Net, such as at 613.org [http://www.613.org/roshyomkippursuccot.html], Berkeley's Judah L. Magnes Museum [http://www.jfed.org/magnes/shofar.htm] and JCN [http://www.jcn18.com/shof0001.htm].

If you've ever struggled in vain to get a melodious tone out of shofar, you may need an expert's advice. If you're in the Boston area, a one-day course is offered at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology on How to Blow a Shofar [http://web.mit.edu/iap/www/search/IAP-904.html]. Sorry, you get no credit for taking this course.

Well, no earthly credit, that is.

May you and your family have a Shanah Tovah U'metukah, a Good and Sweet New Year.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Community of faith needed

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Some time ago, a friend wrote me the following in response to my lament about our age's loss of faith: "It has always struck me that the southern Californian god of health food, and vague new ageisms does not have any meat on his bones; whereas, say, the Gothic, Latin, ... wine drinking, feasting and fasting god of the pre-Vatican II Church gives a man what to grab hold of as he struggles to get to the Lord."

What does this have to do with the Days of Awe soon upon us? Actually, everything.

Both Judaism and Christianity, worn down by the very idea that no one should feel bad about anything, have begun to market their product in brand new ways.

Discard guilt and shame. Stress self-growth. Don't mention those words (sin, punishment, consequences). The goal is to approximate James Brown's triumphant yell: "I feel good."

Out of the blistering culture wars of the last three decades, today's kids have absorbed with unquestioning self-assurance that many ethical decisions are flexible, and that what we feel is more important than what we owe, self-expression far superior to self-sacrifice.

And then there's Rosh Hashanah, a loudmouthed pedlar of truths that we had dismissed as extinct, a day that unabashedly proclaims the fragility of human existence and the unstinting judgment of God.

In the Rambam's words: "The sins of every inhabitant of the world together with his merits are weighed on the festival of Rosh Hashanah. If one is found righteous, [the verdict] is sealed for life. If one is found wicked, [the verdict] is sealed for death. The intermediate person's [fate] is suspended until Yom Kippur."

This is the language of an ancient morality. It is language that is not taken seriously by the vast majority of Jews in the modern world. On a gut, soul-shaking, brutally honest level, it is not even taken seriously by most observant Jews who purport to believe in the severity of its claim.

In modernity, we reinterpret the text to pull away from its frightening implications. The Book of Life and Death becomes a metaphorical fairy tale, and the God of unrelenting assessment becomes a symbol of our own need to examine our deeds.

And therein lies the great problem of contemporary Judaism, and especially of Jewish education. Take some of our sacred sources literally and they seem childlike or alienating; take them metaphorically and they become lightweight, a thin substitute for the trembling scent of death washing over us.

I do not mean to smugly suggest that there are easily available solutions to this dilemma. On the contrary, it is a difficulty that is almost impossible to overcome.

The attempt to break free from ancient codes of morality has given contemporary human beings a sense of liberation, but has also left us feeling profoundly confused as to our identities and lacking the comfort of traditional guidelines which, although rigorous and even punitive, provided certainty and a sense of belonging.

The freedom that many of us feel in comparison to our predecessors of centuries gone by is matched by a deep sense of loss as to just how we should behave, and what our ethics are grounded in.

What is needed is a community of faith willing to talk about and wrestle with the hard questions and engage in a shared experience of searching for credible answers. Perhaps then we can redeem Rosh Hashanah as the rebirth of our souls and our lives.

Exploring the sacred texts

Books
Bernard Baskin

Surpassing Wonder: The Invention of the Bible and the Talmuds*, by Donald Harman Akenson (McGill-Queens, $39.95).

The author of this challenging and remarkable book, an acclaimed professor of history at Queens University, is filled with admiration for the sacred texts of Judaism and Christianity — the Hebrew and Christian scriptures and the Babylonian Talmud.

"They are," he writes, "probably the strongest literary texts ever invented. The secret of that power is that it can be indirectly analyzed but never really explained."

The very power of these texts is so strong, he concludes, that we can never step outside of them to acquire the vision necessary to assay their qualities.

What we acquired from ancient Greece, Rome, Persia and other sources, he suggests, was culture. From the ancient Semites, however, we obtained something broader: "the prerequisites for civilization."

The thesis of this work is that two climactic events in Jewish history – the destruction of the Temple of Solomon in 586 BCE and the Temple of Herod in 70 C.E. – made basic changes in religious faith and understanding necessary.

These events were not just architectural. "In each instance, an entire grid of belief – the location of the God-house, the place of sacrifice to Him, the ritual embodiment of the covenant between [God] and His people and, simultaneously, all the metaphorical aspects of the Temple as symbol of ultimate reality — all that suddenly vanished."

Thus, the preservation of Judaism after 586 BCE depended upon the creation of texts that would exist independently of geography. In the time of Ezra, an unknown author-editor brought together for the first time the disparate documents which became the nine narrative books of the Hebrew scriptures – from Genesis through the Book of Kings.

In time, the first five books of this group became the Torah and received more attention and authority than the rest of the Hebrew scriptures combined.

The destruction of the second Temple was a blow to both Jews and to members of the small Christian sect who now had to formulate new sacred texts. Out of this traumatic event, argues the author, came the four Gospels and the two Talmuds.

Akenson is convinced that the Babylonian Talmud should be better known by both Jews and Christians and he provides a comprehensive and lucid introduction to this complex and many-sided work. He recognizes that the material is extremely difficult.

Actually, few persons have ever read the entire corpus of rabbinical literature. To do so in its original form requires an advanced knowledge of several ancient languages. The Babylonian Talmud itself is more than two million words. Today most yeshivot concentrate their training on a selected band of texts.

In a bold and informed appendix, the author asks: "What can we know historically concerning Yeshua of Nazareth whom the Christian Scriptures transformed into Jesus the Christ?" The answer, he concludes, is very little.

Ultimately, Akenson's proposals are, of course, as much theory as fact. This must be the case with all attempts to unravel the mystery of when, how and why the holy Scriptures of Judaism, Christianity and the Talmuds came to be.

This is not an easy book to read. It presupposes some knowledge of biblical literature, makes use of an extended vocabulary and its major points are tightly argued. Determined readers, however, will find this insightful, informed and often surprisingly witty book a rewarding experience.

Rosh Hashana is a Wonderful Sight for Ethiopian Immigrant

Atras Kesia will add sight to sound when she listens to the shofar trumpet the New Year. Without the UJA Federation-funded Jewish Agency, this Rosh Hashana would have begun in darkness for Kesia, just as they have for the past five years.

At 76, Kesia, a new immigrant from Quara, Ethiopia, can now see again thanks to Jewish Agency workers and surgeons at a Beersheva hospital.

When Kesia arrived in Israel from Quara last November on a Jewish Agency rescue flight, she had to be helped off the plane. After she, her daughter, son-in-law and three grandchildren arrived at the Nurit Absorption Center in Beersheva, her family told social worker Merav Marsiano-Levi about their mother's blindness. When her eyesight began to wane in Ethiopia, none of the doctors she visited knew whether her sight could be saved.

"I had no idea whether her medical problem was treatable but I immediately informed our house mother who is responsible for follow-up on medical problems uncovered during initial interviews," recalled Marsiano-Levi.

On January 23rd, 1999 - two months after arriving in Israel, Kesia's successful cataract operation was performed at the Soroka Medical Center. It was made possible, in part, by special emergency funding provided by the Jewish Agency.

"You have no idea how happy I am to be able to see my daughter and my grandchildren. The light was suddenly turned on and I was reborn," said Kesia. "

Today, with restored sight in one eye, while awaiting a second operation on her other eye, Kesia has regained her independence. While one of the delights of regaining her vision is to see her children and her grandchildren, Atras Kesia says the biggest prize is being able to take in her new surroundings - the landscape of Israel.

The Jewish Agency, assisted by UJA Federation campaign funding, has already brought nearly 2,000 Quara Jews from Ethiopia to Israel. Nearly 1,000 more are scheduled to arrive this fall.

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO
No one gift changes more lives

FROM THE PRESIDENT

As we prepare to celebrate the last Rosh Hashana of the 20th century, it is only natural to contemplate the community's well-being with mixed emotion, as well as renewed hope for the future. We have achieved a great deal as a community as we approach the new millennium: a proud tradition of Tzedakah, an uncompromising commitment to each other, and a strong Federation as the community's driving force.

Yet while our community has grown and prospered into one of the world's most dynamic and compassionate, many members of our community have drifted far from Jewish life and too many live on the financial fringes. Alleviating poverty and hunger, especially among our children, strengthening Jewish identity and addressing broader social issues such as homelessness, are priorities as we move into the next century. The way we, as individuals, deal with these pressing problems will determine the kind of community future generations will inherit.

We must also examine the collective challenges – ensuring refuge in Israel for Jews from the former Soviet Union facing increased anti-Semitism and for the newly-arriving Quara Jews from Ethiopia, fighting anti-Semitism in our own backyard and narrowing the gap between rich and poor. From the indignities we, as Jews, have suffered over the centuries, we are especially sensitive to the need for Tikkun Olam – healing the world - and providing dignity to human life. As we listen to the sound of the shofar this Rosh Hashana and celebrate the world's creation, let us remember that we, as Jews, possess the power to improve the world and to change lives every day.

Shana Tova. May you be written and sealed for a good year.

Alan Sandler

Holiday E-Greetings

For the first time High Holiday well-wishers can send greetings to the entire community courtesy of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Web Site (www.jewishtoronto.net)

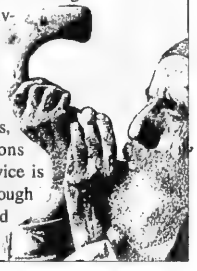
Community members can go on-line to jewishtoronto.net by clicking the High Holiday button on the home page and follow instructions on how to send a greeting. The messages will appear on a jewishtoronto.net bulletin board web site for all to read over the next several weeks.

"This is a great community-building project as well as a wonderful opportunity for people to explore our dynamic site," says Art Benjamin, Chair of the Internet Steering Committee.

Since being launched over one year ago, jewishtoronto.net has expanded to nearly 2,000 pages and includes hundreds of sub-sites on everything from Jewish education to arts and culture.

Special Visits

Thanks to nearly 150 Chaplaincy Services volunteers, the Holidays have been made a little brighter for thousands of community members living in isolation. The compassionate corps of volunteers has been visiting and extending Shana Tova greetings to Jews living in over 50 nursing homes, hospitals and other institutions across the province. The service is funded by UJA Federation through Jewish Family and Child Service.



UJA Federation Campaign 2000 Begins

Goal to raise $50 million annually by 2001

The new leaders of UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 are stressing the way in which each individual can make a difference in improving the lives of many.

"We should never minimize the impact of one deed or one dollar," said David Engel, who is co-chairing UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 with Mel Wolfond. Engel, speaking at the recent sold-out Campaign Launch at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, said "changing lives is what we're all about."

The UJA Federation Campaign kick-off signals the beginning of the seccond year of a drive to raise $50 million annually by the end of 2001. The Chairs are eager to continue the momentum created by last year's Campaign which saw an increase from $36.5 to $40.5 million. Additional funds raised in last year's record-breaking campaign are being used to assist the vulnerable, rescue Jews from the former Soviet Union and other parts of the world and to strengthen Jewish identity. Increased funds from this year's campaign will be allocated to initiatives such as expanding counseling and support for abused women, providing more opportunities for teenagers to participate in the March of the Living and helping the Jewish Agency to free thousands of Jews from the FSU.

Wolfond called the record crowd of Launch participants a testimony to the "remarkable sense of community" UJA Federation cultivates through its work.

"I believe that through UJA Federation we will always develop the community vision which allows other organizations to thrive and grow."

Consultant to Serve Schools

Supplementary schools in Toronto will be receiving some extra help from the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education this year.

As the BJE's new Supplementary School Consultant Shari Schwartz will offer her education expertise to more than 30 Toronto area supplementary schools and their teachers. She will also encourage educators to access the BJE's wide range of educational resources.

Schwartz, whose 20 year career includes teaching at She'arim Day School and most recently as principal of Temple Har Zion's Supplementary School, says shes can't wait to get started.

"This job has been a dream of mine for many years," confesses Schwartz, who served as a member of the BJE's Supplementary School Principals Committee. "There has never been a person dedicated entirely to servicing this population and I'm very honoured to have been chosen for this important role."

In addition to regular on site visits, Schwartz will be running professional development workshops, helping with curriculum development and acting as liaison for the BJE's Supplementary School Committee.

Shari Schwartz

Schwartz is eager to help schools expand family education programs, which have become increasingly popular. She would like to set up a system in which schools with experienced family educators help mentor those that are struggling to get started. "I'd also like to challenge schools providing good programs to reach for the stars," adds Schwartz. Our educators are doing incredible things. "I want to provide them with the tools to go even further."

Providing additional support for supplementary school education is an important component of UJA Federation's Camapign 2000.

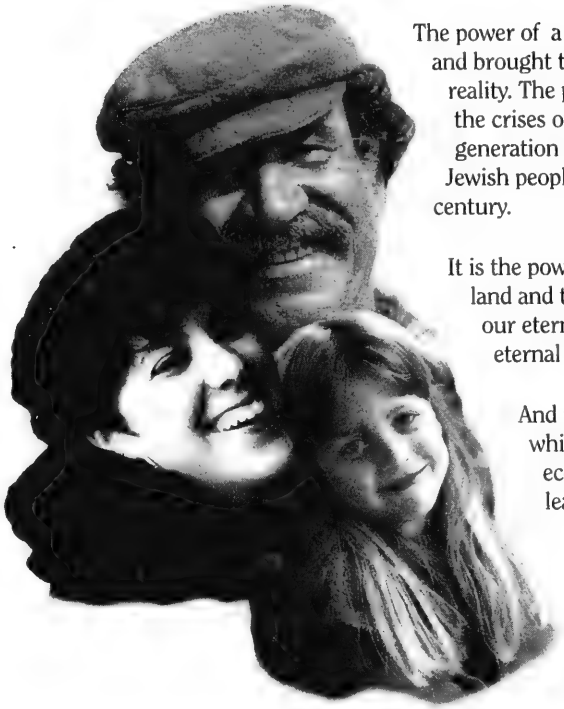
STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS

What our parents gave to us, we give to our children. The power we get is the power we give.

The power of a generation



The power of a generation that overcame adversity and brought the dream of the State of Israel to reality. The power of a generation that witnessed the crises of survival. The power of a new generation that will forge the future of the Jewish people and lead Israel into the twenty-first century.

It is the power of Israel which unites Jews, across land and through time, linking generations in our eternal hope and in fulfillment of our eternal obligation.

And it is the strength of Israel Bonds which has helped Israel to become an economic and technological world leader.

Invest in the success of the State of Israel and guarantee the future of our people for generations to come.

and he was reporting live on the situation from the Pentagon.

Shortly after he speculated – in a broadcast seen in over 200 countries – about the possibility of the United States responding militarily and the length of time it would take to mobilize, a senior Pentagon official contacted him with a message from then U.S. president George Bush.

"The fastest way for the U.S. government to send a warning to Baghdad was to tell a CNN reporter that the U.S. was not ruling out the military option," Blitzer recalled.

The rest of Blitzer's 45-minute talk addressed The World Today, which is also the title of the show he'll be anchoring on CNN, having just completed a lengthy stint as senior White House correspondent.

What happens in one corner of the world resonates instantly, he said. In a positive way, elections in one country can inspire democratic elections elsewhere, he noted.

The negative aspect can occur when ethnic cleansing, for example, emboldens another dictator to follow suit, he added.

Referring to last year's media and government preoccupation with U.S. President Bill Clinton's involvement with Monica Lewinsky, Blitzer wondered aloud whether the war in the Balkans might have been avoided or at least anticipated, had more focus been placed on foreign affairs rather than on "this tawdry if unavoidable scandal."

Coming from Washington, "Campaign 2000" will have a new meaning for him after the Toronto launch, he quipped.

The campaign launch also included entertainment by Israeli singer Marina Faingold and an address by Sigal Hobbey, a 22-year-old Israeli university student who made aliyah from Ethiopia in 1983. A onetime beneficiary of UJA dollars, she now works as an absorption counsellor helping new olim from Ethiopia's Quara region.

Simcha Jacobovici, the award-winning filmmaker whose UJA Federation campaign video premiered at the launch, recalled his student activist days, when he predicted that one day Ethiopian Jews would campaign to save other Jews.

"It's so wonderful to see that Sigal is here, and that we're really all one," he said. "For those who think the great moments in Jewish history have passed, we're just in the middle."

Also on the evening's program were launch chairs Ronald Appleby and Fran Sonshine, Campaign 2000 chairs David Engel and Mel Wolfond, and Women's Campaign chair Carole Sterling.

TECHNION
75 YEARS IN THE MAKING

CELEBRATING THE PAST

1924 In 1924, the Technion became Israel's first university with a class of 16 students and two disciplines of studies: Civil Engineering and Architecture.

1930 - 40 In the 1930's, the Institute was an active centre for students and distinguished academicians from Poland, Germany and Austria who were fleeing the Nazi regime. By 1939, enrollment had increased to 400 students as the Technion began to train mechanical and electrical engineers.

1941 - 49 Nation building and the establishment of the State of Israel put new demands upon the Technion. Additional areas of study were added, thereby increasing both the student and faculty population. The Department of Aeronautical Engineering was established in 1949. With this advanced field, Technion visionaries laid the foundation for Israel's aerospace industries.

1950 - 59 By 1951 undergraduate enrollment had grown to 966. In 1953 the Institute moved to a 300 acre site on Mount Carmel. In the years that followed, the Graduate School was opened, as well as departments in Agricultural Engineering, Food Technology and Industrial Engineering and Management.

1960 - 69 The modern infrastructure of the State of Israel was built during these years by Technion engineers and architects while at the same time leading scientific research was being conducted. In 1969, the Technion's Faculty of Medicine became one of the few medical schools worldwide affiliated with an institute of Technology.

1970 - 79 Departments were opened in Computer Science, Materials Engineering and Biomedical Engineering.

1980 - 89 By the late 1980s, Technion emerged as a full-scale, world renowned scientific technological teaching and research university.

1990 - 99 In the early 90s, massive immigration from the former Soviet Union boosted the student population from 9,000 to 10,500. New academic programs and stronger ties with industry launched yet another campus expansion. Today graduate students comprise 25% of the 12,500 strong student body . Faculty members currently number 770 in 19 faculties and departments. Research is conducted in 30 research centres, 11 research institutes and 9 centres of excellence.

EMBRACING THE FUTURE

"Technion's reputation extends far beyond the borders of Israel. Technion's work in every field, medicine, science, architecture and engineering is synonymous with the creation of the modern State of Israel."
MARGARET THATCHER 1989

"Intel, Motorola, Microsoft and IBM and countless other international high-tech giants know Technion: it's what brought them to Israel. The secret is the superior quality, speed and innovation of Technion graduates. As 70% of Israel's high-tech workforce, they have made Israel the first stop to get further, faster."

Small served as honorary president of Hadassah

TORONTO — The Canadian Hadassah-WIZO family deeply mourns the recent loss of one of its most dedicated and passionate members, Mirial Small, honorary national president. She was 76.

A devoted and lifelong member of the Toronto Aviva chapter, she maintained her deep ties to her chapter even as she immersed herself first at the local and later at the national level.

Small was president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO from 1963-65. Nationally, she held many important positions – membership chair, general secretary and vice-president, before being elected national president from 1980-83. She was the first woman from Toronto to hold this office.

She visited and spoke with every chapter in Canada, spent time at all the projects in Israel, represented Canadian Hadassah-WIZO at WIZO plenaries and at meetings of the Jewish Agency, Zionist General Council and Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Obituary

Small had a creative vision and a special style of leadership. During her tenure, major innovations were undertaken, including the Sports and Cultural Centre at Magdiel, Israel, and the School of Nursing at Assaf Harofeh Hospital in northern Israel.

Upon completing her term as national president, Small was honored by Canadian Hadassah-WIZO with the renaming of the school of nursing as the Mirial Small School of Nursing, Assaf Harofeh Hospital.

During Small's presidency in 1981, the project enrichment gift category of $10,000 was initiated. Ofira Navon, wife of Yitzhak Navon, president of the State of Israel at the time, came to Canada to join in the launching of the project.

Small participated in the People to People Mission to Israel and Egypt which included a visit with Jihan Sadat, widow of President Anwar Sadat, at her home in Giza, Egypt.

Small also served on or chaired many boards, including those at Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Jewish Family and Child Services and Women's Division for United Israel Appeal(UIA).

The trauma of the 1973 Yom Kippur War was the catalyst for her to become the founding chair of the Women's Division of UIA of Canada.

Mirial Small

But Hadassah-WIZO remained central in her life. Her goal was to keep it the strongest, largest major Jewish women's organization in Canada.

Having grown up in St. Catharines with parents who were active Zionists and leaders of their Jewish community, Small was sensitive to the needs of Jewish life in small towns. She resided in Toronto with her husband, the late Dr. Allen Small, a dermatologist who was involved in Zionist and communal activities.

When Small was interviewed for Hadassah-WIZO's 75th Anniversary Commemorative Book, she said, "I had always believed that each of us has the choice of witnessing history, succumbing to the tug of its tide, or of helping to control its flow and I decided to be one who tried to help shape our Jewish world."

Small is survived by her two daughters and their husbands – Fern Small and Barry Wainstein and Anita Small and Norman Rosenbaum, and six grandchildren.

She is also survived by sisters Julia Kertzer and Felice Nussenblatt.

Tradition
HONEY
Paul Stern, President
I remember when I was very small, I used to sit in shul on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur snuggled up to my Saba. I'd listen to Kol Nidre mezmorized by the beauty of the words and the music . . .
And when it was time for the Shofar to sound, I'd close my eyes and puff out my cheeks and pretend that it was me blowing . . .
And there was nothing more delicious than my mother's chicken soup or my Aunt Clara's desserts.
After all these years, all the familiarity, I still look forward to Yom Tov with great excitement. Now I celebrate these times with my family and I know these traditions will carry on.
In this changing world hold on to the things you can rely on Wishing you and your family a very Happy, Healthy, Prosperous New Year.
Thank you for making us one of your family traditions.

Outreach service offered

TORONTO — Sarah Borenstein was not a regular shul goer. For years, she did not attend High Holy Day services. Last year, however Borenstein was one of the many who attended Beth Tzedec Congregation's outreach service.

"It was a wonderful experience," she said. "You could stop and ask questions and not feel uncomfortable. I was impressed with the number of people who came out."

The outreach service is designed to meet the needs of those who have felt excluded in the past; those who want a traditional service but do not know how to follow and are left unsatisfied.

The service is for those who would like to learn and not feel self-conscious knowing others are ahead of them, according to Beth Tzedec.

Joan Gold joined the eight-week explanatory Shabbat service that is also part of the outreach service. Everyone learns — if you're puzzled, you can stop and ask questions, Gold says.

"As well as affirming my Jewish roots, it was a dream come true to be able to participate in and understand the services."

During the same eight weeks, one can take advantage of a crash Hebrew literacy campaign for beginners and intermediates.

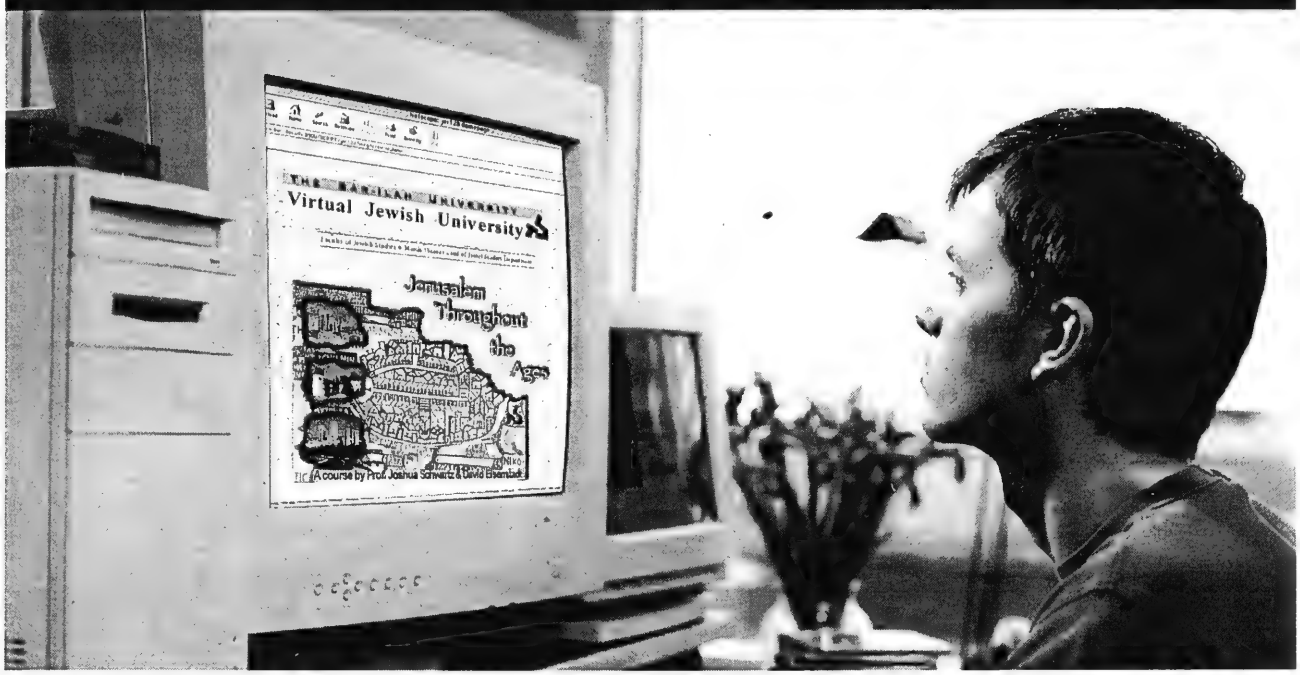
The little minyan service is another of Beth Tzedec's alternative services. Now entering its fifth year, the little minyan is for all ages. It is participatory, child friendly and with lots of singing.

Under the direction of Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, Beth Tzedec has created many new and diverse services for everyone — the family, the young couple, the single, and the senior. The goal is to give the people what they want the way they want it.

Why is Beth Tzedec again reaching out and offering these alternative worship experiences for members and non-members? Because the need is still there and they want to fill it, as Rabbi Tanenbaum says.

"Today, a synagogue has to be as multifaceted as the people who enter its doors," he explains.

Now, your mind can go to Israel without your body.



(and come back with university credits)

Thanks to the Virtual Jewish University (http://www.bar-ilan.edu), a program of Bar-Ilan University, you can take on-line, for-credit courses on Jewish history and culture from some of Israel's most distinguished scholars.

World-class professors from Bar-Ilan U., Israel's largest university, are offering the following courses in English via the Internet this fall:

- The Judean Desert Scrolls
- Jerusalem Throughout the Ages
- Music and Culture in Traditional Jewish Society
- War and Peace in the Bible
- The Yearly Cycle – Holidays of Israel
- The Laws of Family and Relations

If you study at the VJU, you'll benefit from some of the most advanced long-distance learning technology in the world: audio-visual tours of historic sites, a chance to see and hear Jewish music and rituals, private conferences with professors, real-time chats with fellow students and other educational tools.

Full undergraduate credit is available and is transferable to universities of distinction around the world. Next semester starts October 4th. Space is limited.

New guidelines on home care seen as resulting in less care

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A change in the provincial criteria for home care has resulted in less care for more people, said Michael Scheinert, Circle of Care executive director.

The new criteria mean that home care now covers many categories that were previously funded in other ways, he explained. These include acute care cases, ongoing chronic situations and the frail elderly.

The agency is coping with the new situation as best it can, Scheinert said, noting that its ability to subsidize people needing public support is limited by the amount of government funding the agency gets for this purpose.

Circle of Care provides home care for both private and public cases, he said. "We are under a lot of pressure."

The difficulties in providing home care are not related to the entrance of private for-profit agencies to the field, he said.

"We've had a number of calls from people who are in desperate situations," said Fay Geitzhals, Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) supervisor of intake workers.

JF&CS is not directly connected to the funding of home care, Geitzhals said. "We only see the results of the problem. We don't see it as a major crisis since we've only had a smattering of calls."

She said in one case, a woman who was at home after cancer surgery was unable to get out of bed, and although friends were helping out, she could not get enough home care.

The role of the JF&CS in these cases is one of advocacy, Geitzhals said. The original order for home care is written by the doctor and JF&CS works with agencies in a supportive role, she explained.

"We get excellent co-operation from Circle of Care," she said.

Concern about the long-term effects of government underfunding of home care was expressed by Al Gorlick, chair of the Alliance of Seniors to Protect Canada's Social Programs.

The underfunding will eventually drive not-for-profit agencies out of the field and they will be replaced by for-profit private agencies whose main concern is the bottom line, said Gorlick.

The alliance represents 50,000 seniors in the Greater Toronto Area, he said.

Shaar Shalom gets first full-time cantor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL, ONT. — Cantor David Harel began his career as a businessman, and only changed professional direction around the time he turned 40.

His late father, Azriel, was a longtime shaliach tzibur, and his grandfather was a chazzan and shochet in Russia. His mother, Nechama, sang professionally in Russia in the late 1930s.

Cantor Harel's son – one of his four adult children – has also worked as a chazzan. (A grandfather of nine, the cantor also has two younger children from his second marriage.)

"Once you have it in your genes, maybe you can't escape it," Cantor Harel, a lyric tenor, said in a recent interview at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, where last month he became the first full-time cantor at the 25-year-old congregation.

Not that he wants to escape it. "I'm doing what I love to do," he said. "This is not work for me."

It was a circuitous path – professionally and geographically – that led him to Toronto.

Born in Minsk in 1942, the future cantor emigrated to Israel in 1949. His father, a Polish citizen who had served in the Russian army, was allowed to go back to Poland in the mid-1940s, facilitating the family's eventual aliyah via a displaced persons camp in Germany.

An alumnus of the IDF's élite Golani Brigade, where he Hebraicized his name from Judenberg, the cantor earned a BA in Political Science and Economics from Sir George Williams University in Montreal in 1967.

After directing an import company in Canada for two years, he returned to Israel and established his own business.

In 1984, he was offered his first full-time cantorial position, in Birmingham, England, contingent on his completing formal studies at Jews' College in London. He had already begun Jewish studies, including chazzanut, in Israel.

Cantor David Harel

Subsequent positions took him to London, England; Johannesburg and Montreal, where he served most recently at Chevra Kadisha-B'Nai Jacob Synagogue. He also lived in Ra'anana, Israel during the mid-1990s.

A good cantor, he believes, expresses musically what congregants may be unable to express themselves.

"Words are limiting. When you sing, the krechtz and the kvetch can go directly from one heart to another. Sometimes there are no words to express things."

Cantor Harel believes that music provides "emotional and intellectual nourishment" that is as vital as food in making people feel alive and vibrant.

His position at Shaar Shalom is his first at a Conservative synagogue, but "from the start we hit it off," said the cantor, who is the descendent of two prominent Chabad families.

Trip to Rwanda 'awakening' for Holocaust Centre director

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Louis Kanamugire has a daunting task, and Carole Ann Reed, director of education of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, is determined to help.

Kanamugire works for the Ministry of Youth and Culture in Rwanda, and is responsible for documenting the Rwandan genocide.

Reed, who met Kanamugire on a recent trip to Rwanda, says she would like to bring him here so he can learn how survivors can be used as volunteers to shape genocide education. She has approached the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) for funds, "and things are looking good," she says.

Reed, who has been with the centre for two years, says her association with Rwanda began when Shyrna Gilbert, president of Hope for Rwanda's Children Fund, called and said that she thought the Jewish community could be of assistance.

"The first thing we did was get some Holocaust survivors to support a walk that gives money to Rwandan orphans. There are 400,000 orphans there, which is why the task of documenting the genocide falls under the Ministry of Youth and Culture," says Reed.

Last spring, she says, with the support of the centre and UJA Federation, and at the invitation of Madame Seraphine Bizimungu, wife of the president of Rwanda – who had visited the centre here – she had an opportunity to take a trip to Rwanda in order to learn more about that country's genocide.

"This trip was an awakening for me. I had been to Poland as part of B'nai Brith's Holocaust and Hope tour for educators through Poland, Germany and Israel, and in Rwanda I kept reliving the times in Poland; the parallels are so striking – people being targeted because of racial and ethnic identity.

"While there, we visited genocide sites and talked to survivors. The stories we heard had echoes of the stories we've heard [about the Holocaust.]

"Every historical event, however, is unique. What I learned in Rwanda, and what I took from my talks there, informs my behavior. The Rwandan community has special needs to which they feel Jews can relate."

Wherever she went in the country, "to the most remote genocide sites, everyone knew about the Holocaust. They felt we had a special resonance."

The Rwandan government plans to build a genocide memorial centre at Murambe, says Reed, a site where 140,000 people were killed, and where bodies still remain. "Louis will be responsible for this centre. I believe that it is a natural thing for the Holocaust centre to provide him with training, and for him to see how survivors are central to the program."

Reed says she would like him to come for Yom Hashoah, in order to see how Jews commemorate it. "We have such resources and experience here, it puts us in a natural position to share."

Dutch family reconnects with long-lost Canadian cousins

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Until two years ago, Betty Spuyman was unaware she had an extended family.

As far as she knew, Spuyman, 60, who was born in Holland during World War II and still lives there, had lost all her aunts, uncles and cousins in the Holocaust.

Her life changed, however, when a Toronto cousin, Michael Englishman, went to a cemetery in Holland to look for his grandmother's gravestone, and discovered a gravestone with the surname Ereira Englishman on it.

"It was a stone that someone had recently erected," Spuyman said. "And it struck him that maybe he had family of which he, too, was unaware; someone that could be related to him had put up that stone."

After discovering that Spuyman's mother, Margaret Ereira – who died almost one year ago – had put up the stone and was indeed his first cousin, Englishman called Ereira, and they reunited in Florida.

It was not until recently, though, that Spuyman came to Canada and met Englishman's daughter, Katy Brass, also 60, and also born in Holland.

"Growing up in Holland, my mother always talked about our family. We thought we had no one left, and there was always something missing inside of us. My mother had six children because she wanted them named for her dead relatives," said Spuyman.

Throughout the years, Spuyman had advertised in newspapers in Russia, Ukraine and Poland looking for family members, but she had never gotten a response.

"To find family now makes me feel very rich. We've discovered we have so much in common. We really feel like family, not at all like people who just recently met.

"I am grateful that my mother lived to have this reunion. Nothing is more important than family," said Spuyman.

When Englishman visited Holland during her mother's illness, Spuyman said her mother's whole attitude changed. "It brightened her life."

Living today in Haarlem, a city with about 500 Jews, Spuyman, a skin therapist, is active in her synagogue and in her community's Hadassah-WIZO. She said she still gets upset when she hears stories about the Holocaust. "I never, never got over what happened."

She is married, but never had children. "I'm too afraid of another war. I can't bear the thought of losing anyone else."

Victims of Swiss Air crash remembered

BY JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — More than 250 members of the Jewish and secular communities listened in silent awe as Rabbi Joshua Mann talked of the hurt of the Swiss Air crash a year ago off Peggy's Cove, N.S., which took 229 lives, including 21 Jews.

Rabbi Mann, Boston-raised but now living in Israel, flew to Halifax to join his mother, brother, sister and several nieces and nephews who attended memorial services for the victims.

He lost his brother Jonathan, an AIDS researcher working out of Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore.

"We were close," said Rabbi Mann. "We spoke often and asked each other relevant questions about what we each were doing."

Rabbi Mann spoke at Beth Israel Synagogue in Halifax on Sept. 1, the eve of the anniversary of the air disaster. The memorial service there impressed Andrew and Elinor Eder of Connecticut, who lost their closest friends, Karen and Leonard Kleinman, in the crash.

"The sheer number of people who were here on a weeknight was heartwarming," said Elinor Eder. "We attended both services [the other was at the crash site] today. The depth of the community, standing in line to greet us and feed us was very touching."

Cindy Hatstadt of Connecticut attended with her brothers Michael and Danny Mallin, her husband Phillipe and her mother-in-law. "We lost my parents, Gilda and Ralph Mallin, and this service tonight was a meaningful welcome from the Jewish community.

"In the last year, we had two memorial services and then a burial when the remains were found," she said. "Today was very long, but it was comforting to be around the other families who lost loved ones."

With Rosh Hashanah only 10 days away, Rabbi Mann's theme was renewal and regaining a proper spiritual perspective after such a major loss.

"The best way to honor...the memory of a loved one is to take the powerful aftershock and utilize it as a force for change and growth," he said.

He said there is an interesting tension between the obligation to mourn and the need to be in touch with the pain and sadness of loss.

"We're human and have hearts. Naturally we'll have those feelings. But the code of Jewish law says one is not supposed to mourn or cry overly much. In Judaism, the bigger picture is the continuity of the soul."

He suggested everything that happens is for our benefit.

"The experience of suffering is an integral part of life, but it is also supposed to transform into energy to refocus on the importance of the meaning of life."

He said time changes our vision, our intellect and our spiritual insight.

"We come to terms and elevate the experience [of sadness and mourning] to shake us from from our worldly concerns and reconnect with the basics. We use the opportunity to uplift our physical being to connect to the Creator by helping others."

During conversations with his brother, Jonathan, the rabbi said, "We talked of the Tower of Babel and he asked me, 'What was bothering God' in getting involved with the conflict between people that led to the development of a wide variety of languages?

"Jonathan felt the situation was no threat to God; so I pursued it and researched it and realized unity is one of the most powerful of human forces. If people act together, it could have a subsequent effect on humankind."

Rabbi Moshe Krupka, national director of synagogue services for the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, introduced the guest speaker, but also sent a powerful message to the audience.

Rabbi Joshua Mann

"A year later, we still ask why this happened. The answer? God sent us miracles from this disaster. You could see miracles as the RCMP and military went beyond the call of duty to bring comfort and consolation to family members.

"You could see perfect strangers in hotel lobbies giving consolation. And [medical examiner] John Butt wouldn't rest until he preserved the sensitivity of those affected by the tragedy," Rabbi Krupka said.

"There were divine messages around us."

New day school opens doors in Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The Kehila Jewish Community Day School (KJCDS) is opening its doors this year with an enrolment of 12 children.

KJCDS is not affiliated with any movement or religious group but is a member of the Jewish Community Day School Network, a professional association linking over 50 schools across North America, committed to providing "a superior education in an intensive pluralistic Jewish learning environment."

The school's aim, says principal Hamutal Deckel, is to create "an environment steeped in Jewish values and ethics. We are a community-based school, open to all streams of Judaism."

For the time being, the school will consist of two classes – senior kindergarten, and a combined Grade 1 to 3 class.

KJCDS will be housed on the lower floor of Temple Anshe Sholom, where kindergarten teacher, Adi Bell, and Grade 1, 2 and 3 teacher, Melissa Tabacman, have been unpacking furniture, decorating their bright and cheerful classrooms and preparing teaching materials.

In addition to Tabacman, the class will also have a teaching assistant.

The objective is to foster respect and appreciation for all Jews, Deckel says, and Judaism "will be taught in such a way that students will be able to learn to distinguish between the different streams of Judaism and make informed decisions later."

A living language

Hebrew will be taught as a living language and there will be strong emphasis on the "centrality of Israel in Jewish life."

Teaching methodology will be based on an "integrated curriculum and a multiple intelligence approach" to teaching developed by Harvard psychologist Howard Gardner, with "lots of hands-on activity, art, music and movement," says Deckel.

Recently widowed, Jerusalem-born Deckel comes here after nine years as a media specialist at a Jewish day school in Las Vegas, where she also developed a comprehensive computer literacy program and produced her own educational videos.

Her credentials include service in the Israeli army as a psychometric diagnostician, a BA in literature from Bar-Ilan University and a degree from the Institute of Experimental Open Education in Jerusalem.

She took an extensive program in Israel preparing administrators and teachers in the use of the computer as a tool in active learning environments, spent four years teaching elementary school and worked as a research assistant for the Israeli Ministry of Education.

She says she is excited about the opportunity to be involved in building a new school from the ground up.

RECIPE CORRECTION

In the Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah article on vegetarian dishes by Edith Rothschild (Aug. 26), the recipe for the Super Rainbow Salad contained an incorrect instruction under the heading: Helpful Hint. The recommended ratio of greens for the salad should be one part radicchio and Belgian endive to four parts salad greens.

The CJN regrets the error.

Scene in Ottawa

Recent media coverage of the political sector has narrowed the ongoing story category to two.

The first is the unchallenged rule of the Liberal government, despite the infighting and the absence of the vision thing. The second is the unending, soap-opera like efforts of "recons" (Reform-Conservatives) to unite the right.

Thus the prospect of a juicy NDP policy convention must have lifted the spirits of political journalists.

Ironically, the NDP borrowed a theme from the recent Liberal caucus meetings in Halifax. The pre-convention hype billed this conference as a contest pitting the tax cutters against the social spenders (sound familiar?). It was touted as a confrontation within the labor movement, the NDP old guard against the grass-roots idealists, and, most significantly, a test of the leader's ability to control the policy direction of the party.

Now that the convention is history, let's assess exactly what was accomplished. The leader won the fight and the NDP platform did indeed slide towards that grey mid-point on the political spectrum that is now claimed by four of the five parties in the House of Commons. So effective was the shift that Tory Premier of Ontario, Mike Harris wrote to congratulate the delegates for their consideration of the tax cut issue!

The Canadian Labor Congress managed to alienate virtually every other significant union in the country, thereby entrenching the pattern of impotency that has attached to the Labor movement's reputation as an agent of social change in Canada.

The gap deepened between the party faithful and its handful of elected members, prompting questions about the value to the party of MPs like the Fab Four (Robinson, Riis, Blaikie and Nystrom), all of whom have been in Parliament for more than twenty years.

The NDP spin-doctors (yes, even socialists have them) explained that the ill will and tension generated at the conference was regrettable 'collateral damage' in a critical and successful attempt to make the NDP more attractive to Canadian voters. The only question is that if this strategy was indeed so effective, how come most Canadians still cannot name the leader of the NDP?

P.S. Her name is Alexa McDonough!

Middle East Peace Quilt unites Arabs, Jews

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER – The Middle East Peace Quilt, an international community art project produced and facilitated by Vancouver fabric artist Sima Elizabeth Shefrin, will be presented at the Roundhouse Community Centre in Vancouver (181 Roundhouse Mews on Pacific Boulevard) from Sept. 13 to 28.

An exhibit of over 25 quilts will be on display and a variety of workshops will be held, including video nights, Internet drop-in, peace quilt workshops and peace tales.

The run will conclude Sept. 28 with Breaking Bread Together, a vegetarian Middle Eastern meal, followed by a program of Jewish and Arabic music featuring Moshe Denburg and Adel Awad.

The Middle East Quilt Project and Exhibition, sponsored by the Puffin Foundation, incorporates the visions of peace of over 200 individuals from across Europe and North America (including contributions from students at the Morris Winchevsky School in Toronto).

Contributors to the project include people of different ages, neophyte and professional artists, and Jews and Palestinians. Each participant contributed squares to the quilt, which was then sewn together in a series of nine squares.

The quilts are accompanied by statements from those who contributed the squares.

Artist and quilter Shefrin has incorporated Jewish themes into her work in the past, and has shared her passion for peace by conducting a workshop called Stitching for Social Change, the use of Fabric to Build a Better World.

The Middle East Peace Quilt, her latest project, attempts to build a better world by bringing Jews and Palestinians together.

"All over North America, as well as in other places, there are groups of Jews and Palestinians coming together to talk and get to know each other and learn to be friends," she says.

Shefrin created the quilt to accelerate the process and "to provide a venue for friendly dialogue between Jews and Palestinians" as well as "to provide a focus for Middle East Peace education."

She believes the quilt will "give people an opportunity to make these connections and think about the issues in a new way.

"There will also be opportunities to make squares and add to the quilt. It will continue to grow as it travels, providing an opportunity for discussion and creating new friendships wherever it goes."

The Middle East Peace quilt will be on display at the Maltwood Art Gallery at the University of Victoria in February, and at the Kootenay Art Gallery in Castlegar, B.C., later in the year.

For further information on the project, call 604-713-1800 or e-mail quilt@vcn.bc.ca.

McMaster prof named as a Fellow in Royal Society

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Dr. Jack Hirsh, professor emeritus at McMaster University's medical school and a renowned researcher into vascular disease, was one of four McMaster University scientists recently named Fellows of the Royal Society of Canada.

The other three are astronaut Roberta Bondar, Dr. Frank Graham of the departments of biology, pathology and molecular medicine, and chemist Dr. Gary Schrobilgen.

A native of Melbourne, Australia, Hirsh is director of the Hamilton Civic Hospitals Research Centre.

After graduating from Melbourne University, he continued his training in hematology in St. Louis and London and came to Toronto in the mid-1960s, where he worked under Dr. Fraser Mustard.

He returned to Australia for three years and in 1970, returned to Canada as head of hematology at St. Joseph's Hospital. In 1981 he was appointed chair of the McMaster department of medicine, but resigned in 1988 to become director of the research centre.

His research has led to significant advances in the prevention, diagnosis and treatment of thrombosis, a major cause of heart disease and stroke.

Hirsh is the recipient of numerous awards, both Canadian and international, and most recently was awarded an honorary doctorate of science at McMaster university's faculty of health sciences spring convocation.

'Righteous' Dutch couples were driven by human values

By WENDY GOLDBLATT SCHNEIDER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — The families of two deceased Dutch couples who hid Jews during World War II assembled at Adas Israel Synagogue here last week to receive Yad Vashem's prestigious designation of Righteous Among the Nations on behalf of their parents.

The request to honor Hendrik and Theresa Veenstra was made by Philip Plas, who was taken into the Veenstra home as a young child and stayed for two years.

The Veenstras had four children of their own, and despite a serious illness that afflicted Mrs. Veenstra towards the end of the war, they cared for Plas for the war's entire duration.

The Veenstra children were on hand for the occasion, as was Plas, who came from Holland with his wife for the occasion.

Both Plas and a representative of the Veenstra family recalled the years they played together and shared the same dinner table.

Lucas and Aleida Koops were also honored, based on testimony from Miriam Shoshani-Berger of Israel, who was a 15-year-old German Jewish refugee living in Holland when she was taken in by the Koops under the guise of being a nanny for their children.

In addition to Shoshani-Berger, who stayed with the family for two years, the Koops hid two other Jews.

A representative of the Koops family said his parents rarely spoke about what they did during the war, but when pressed, would only say that they were acting out of human values.

He said they even managed to keep from the children the fact that two men were hiding in the master bedroom for an entire year.

Both Mr. Veenstra and Mr. Koops were active in the Dutch underground and were motivated by a sense of inner conviction and religious belief.

The Koops children, meanwhile, are carrying on the family tradition. One of their children welcomed two families from Laos into her home at the height of the "boat people" crisis in the late 1970s.

Representing the government of Israel was consul general Jehudi Kinar, who remarked that this had been the first time during his tenure that such a ceremony was held outside Toronto.

Adding to the poignancy of the occasion was the fact that Kinar himself was a hidden child in the Netherlands during the war. His voice broke with emotion when he recalled that reading the survivor testimonies about what these families had done reminded him of his own story.

Rabbi Morton Green of Adas Israel Synagogue answered the question that was uppermost on the minds of those present when he asked, "What gave these individuals the inner courage to place themselves in such a precarious position and come to the rescue of Jews who were so despised?"

His answer: Through their extraordinary acts, these people were reflections of the image of God in human form.

CJA donors to have say in how money is spent

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Donors to the 1999 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) will have a greater say in how their money is spent.

General campaign chair Joel King said that after meeting donors over the past few months, he has concluded that people "want greater input into where their dollars flow."

The only catch is you have to give more than you did last year.

He announced at the kick-off party for the $35-million drive that, for the first time, donors who increase their gift over that of 1998 can specify where the additional portion goes, either all or part.

There are restrictions, however. The donor can choose from seven areas: assisting the poor, including immigrants; caring for the elderly; supporting Jewish education and identity, a broad heading that includes Holocaust remembrance; programs for youth and young adults; services to the Sephardi community; rescuing Jews in peril for resettlement in Israel; and supplying food and medicine to needy Jews in the former Soviet Union.

The funds will be directed to the relevant FEDERATION CJA agency, or, in the case of the latter two categories, to the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Joint Distribution Committee.

Those who have not given in a few years can direct up to 50 percent of the increased portion of their gift to one of these areas.

King also issued a challenge to 1,300 campaign volunteers who attended the launch held at the downtown club Le Medley which featured comedic impersonator André-Philippe Gagnon.

For every face-to-face meeting by a canvasser that results in an increased donation, King said, he and his wife Marlene will contribute $250 to the campaign to a maximum of $100,000.

King wants to encourage greater personal contact between canvassers and the community members. Special pins will be awarded to those who reach out to their "cards" in this way. Those conducting three face-to-face meetings will get a bronze, six rates a silver, and nine garners gold.

The 1999 campaign has the highest goal ever set by CJA.

"The goal is first and foremost raising funds, but the campaign is about more than money. It's about community, people and caring," he said.

King related how as a child, he and his family had benefited from the Jewish community's services. His mother died leaving his father with three young children. Their grandmother helped, but assistance from the community made the difference.

He emphasized that he makes no distinctions between Ashkenazim and Sephardim. "We are one people with one heart and one Torah. Together we are strong."

The evening was light on speeches. People had come to have fun, and didn't leave disappointed.

The atmosphere was youthful, with loud music, roving lights and a trendy setting. The theme was sporty. "Team CJA" chairs were decked out in T-shirts with a big "99" and the formalities were referred to as "the pre-game show."

Gagnon was the main event, keeping the audience agog with the diversity and accuracy of his repertoire that spans dozens of popular singers. The Quebec star's talent is such that he can switch from one very distinct voice to another in rapid succession.

In one memorable skit, parodying the record albums sold on TV that feature singers with little in common, Gagnon ran through Robert Goulet, Alice Cooper, (all of) the Oakridge Boys, the Bee Gees, Midnight Oil, Barry White and Phil Collins.

He did The Temptations, running between four microphones to mimick each's voice; the Rolling Stones, in turn playing a prancing Mick Jagger and the two deadpan guitarists; Julio Iglesias and Willy Nelson doing their duet of To All the Girls I've Loved, and even Nat King Cole and daughter Nathalie singing Unforgettable.

A segment dedicated to celebrity scandals, Gagnon was Ringo Starr singing for Woody Allen "You're 16, you're my daughter, and you're mine."

Another hit with the standing-room-only crowd was Gagnon's "worst singles of all time." They included Roger Whittaker singing Stairway to Heaven, Leonard Cohen droning through the Club Med theme (Hands Up), Bob Dylan muddling his way through Feelings, pan flutist Zamphir playing We Will Rock You, and – the very worst – any American singer trying to sing O Canada.

Also appreciated was Gagnon's Bill Clinton on the Arsenio Hall show. Donning sunglasses, Gagnon played the Pink Panther theme on the saxophone, using only his athletic vocal chords.

Gagnon demonstrated just what an ear he has for imitating sounds when he picked a man out of the audience and had him sing a few lines from The Way We Were. In an instant replay, Gagnon sang back the painfully off-key rendition.

The evening, co-chaired by Rita Guindi, Alan Pinchuk and Annuta Pinchuk, was sponsored by Chubb Insurance Company of Canada and Provigo.

LEGAL NOTICE BY ORDER OF THE COURT

TO VICTIMS OF NAZI PERSECUTION AND THEIR HEIRS WHO MAY HAVE CLAIMS AGAINST CERTAIN AUSTRIAN BANKS RELATING TO THE HOLOCAUST

Bank Austria and Creditanstalt have agreed to pay $40 million in settlement of legal claims relating to the conduct of their businesses before and during World War II. You may be eligible to participate in this settlement if you were victimized by the Nazi regime and were damaged directly or indirectly by these Austrian banks. The United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (the "Court") will hold a hearing on November 1, 1999 to decide whether the Settlement should be given final approval.

This is a summary.
If you are not sure whether you are affected, you should request a detailed mailed notice.

1. Who Is Affected By The Settlement. Not all Holocaust survivors or their heirs are affected by the settlement. You are affected only if you (or your immediate deceased relative) were persecuted by the Nazi regime between 1933 and 1946 because of your race, religion, ethnic origin, nationality, political belief, sexual orientation or disability. In addition, you must have been damaged directly or indirectly by Bank Austria or Creditanstalt and fit within one of the following categories:

a. Had assets on deposit with these banks which were confiscated, stolen or not returned; or

b. Had assets which were looted by the Nazis and transferred to these banks; or

c. Sent monies to concentration camp inmates through these banks that was diverted and never reached the recipient; or

d. Were a slave laborer and these banks profited from your labor.

2. How And When Claims Will Be Paid. If the Court gives final approval to the settlement, a Claims Review Committee will examine all claims submitted and pay valid claims to the extent of the claim's value and the available settlement monies. The detailed Mailed Notice explains how you can receive a claim form.

3. If You Do Not Want To Participate. If you do not wish to partipate or be legally bound by the Settlement, you must exclude yourself by writing a letter so indicating to the address given below by October 18, 1999. If you do not write a letter, you will be barred from prosecuting any legal action against these banks relating to the settled disputes. If you exclude yourself you CANNOT file a claim.

4. How To Comment Or Object. If you do not exclude yourself, you may comment on the terms of the Settlement by October 18, 1999. The Mailed Notice describes how to submit comments or objections. You have the right to appear at the November 1, 1999 final approval hearing in person or through counsel, although you do not have to.

5. Who Represents You. The Court appointed attorneys to serve as settlement class counsel and appointed settlement class representatives. You do not have to personally pay any of the Court appointed lawyers. The attorneys will seek compensation for their services and reimbursement of their costs at a later time from the settlement fund.

6. Getting More Information. To request a Mailed Notice, please send your request to the address below or visit the website: http://www.austrianbankclaims.com

שישאר בינינו

גאווה אוסטרית:

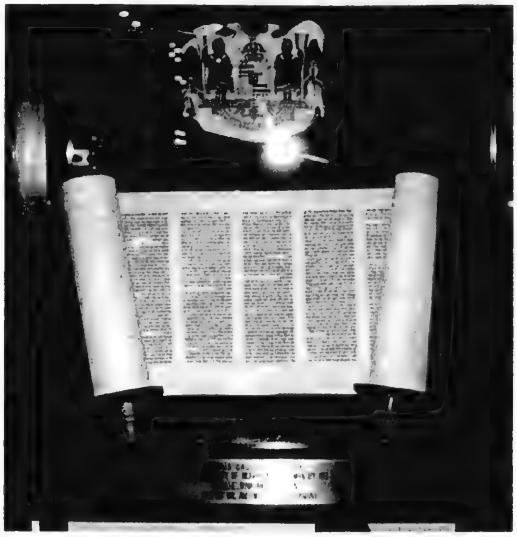
Hawaii's Jewish presence: Life and faith amid sun, sea

BY ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff



Sefer Torah given to King Kalakaua by Elias Rosenberg.

[Anna Turkienicz photo]

HONOLULU — There probably weren't any Jews aboard Captain James Cook's ships when he landed on the Hawaiian islands in 1778. Or were there?

While there are no reports of Jews on Cook's ships, there were probably Jews on the islands in the early 1800s, said Joseph Morgan, a geography professor at the University of Hawaii.

By that time, Hawaii was recognized as a good place to come and start a business, he said, and many American and British merchants were coming and going. Jews could easily have been among the groups of traders that were then arriving in the islands, said Morgan.

However, there is an even earlier reference to a Jewish presence. In John Mulholland's book, Hawaii's Religions, reference is made to the records of a sailor on a whaling ship in 1798. Ebenezer Townsend records that when the Hawaiian King Kamehameha came on board, "he also brought a Jew cook with him."

Some historians, such as David Malo, in his book entitled Hawaiian Antiquities, have even presented the possibility that the early Polynesians who settled the islands around the fifth century, may have been "the lost sheep of the House of Israel."

Early Hawaiian history is obscure and vague, Malo writes, because it was passed down by legends and stories based on memory. The Polynesians apparently left no written records of their early history.

However, certain customs that were observed in Hawaii are similar to those of the Israelites. Malo points out that "circumcision, places of refuge, taboos and ceremonies of purification relating to dead bodies and their burial; taboos and restrictions pertaining to women…are customs practised by the people of Hawaii."

While there are many scholars who do not agree with these theories, by 1901 there was a definite Jewish presence and a Jewish benevolent society and a Jewish cemetery were established.

Rabbi Avi Magid of the Temple Emanu-El Synagogue in Honolulu said Jews came to the islands for various reasons.

"Hawaii constitutes the Jewish frontier," said Rabbi Magid. "Jews don't move to the frontier because they are looking for a good corned-beef sandwich.

"Jews may have initially been a part of a group of early traders, and then they became providers of dry goods for sailors."

Rabbi Magid pointed out that Temple Emanu-El houses a Torah and pointer that were brought to Hawaii from San Francisco in 1886 by Elias Abraham Rosenberg, who then presented them to King Kalakaua. A plaque on the temple's walls states that Rosenberg ingratiated himself with the king and became something of a royal soothsayer.

The pointer was presented to the temple by the royal family in 1959 to commemorate the construction of Temple Emanu-El, the first Jewish house of worship built in Hawaii.

The Torah was lost for several years, but in 1972, a Honolulu attorney rediscovered it as part of the estate of a deceased client. He later donated the Torah to the temple.

During World War II, the military establishment brought many Jews to the islands, Rabbi Magid said.

In fact, the Aloha Jewish Chapel was built on military grounds about

Lack of kosher food a major problem on islands

25 years ago to serve this continuing presence, said Rabbi Sean Gorman.

Rabbi Gorman, the U.S. Navy's chaplain at the chapel, said it is difficult to put a number on the size of his congregation because the members are coming and going all the time.

"However, we definitely have an eclectic group," he said. "There are a few doctors, a former submarine captain, several combat officers, a nuke [reactor operator], a ground-pounder [infantry], and a first sergeant from the air force."

The group includes a few women. One is in intelligence, and the others are doctors.

Services are held every Friday night and Saturday morning, and approximately 45 percent of the group come with their families. A Torah study group, which usually has eight people, meets once a week, Rabbi Gorman said.

Those meetings are often quite insightful, given the nature of the participants. They seem to be especially interested in the military tactics and strategies that were used in the Bible. It makes for some intriguing discussions, he said.

The most common issue that comes to him, he said, is the need for extra money to buy kosher food. Rabbi Gorman has to vouch for their credibility so that soldiers can qualify.

"Kosher food is one of the biggest problems on the islands today. I am currently working with the Chabad rabbi on [these types of] issues, which are affecting the community."

The rabbis often work together on issues that deal with the whole community, Rabbi Gorman said. There are six rabbis on the island – one Orthodox, three Conservative and two Reform.

Congregation Sof Ma'arav (furthest west) is one of the Conservative synagogues on the island.

"Its name is taken from the Judah Halevi poem," said Sally Morgan, vice-president of the synagogue. (The words are found in a poem by the 11th-century Spanish poet: "My heart is in the east, and I am at the end of the west.")

"We are indeed one of the congregations furthest west," Morgan said.

It important to be innovative if you are Jewish in Hawaii, she said. This is evidenced by the congregation's publication entitled The When you live in Hawaii you get very creative during Passover cookbook.

Rabbi Sean Gorman at the Aloha Jewish Chapel. [Anna Turkienicz photo]

Because the Jewish community on the islands is so small and isolated, said Rabbi Magid, it requires an effort on the part of the Jews to be members of their community.

According to Rabbi Magid, each of the islands, except for Molokai, has at least one synagogue and some of the islands have several.

As to whether the early Polynesian settlers were from the lost tribes of Israel, Rabbi Magid said, "The thought makes you pause and smile. While the language and customs are too dissimilar – deep down in your heart you want to believe that the connection is there."

Parents urged to discuss dangers of cults with kids

By MERRY MADWAY EISENSTADT
Washington Jewish Week

WASHINGTON — Les and Nora Baker aren't Jewish, but say the story of how their daughter got sucked into a controversial cult operating on the University of Maryland College Park campus should resonate deeply with Jewish parents.

Jewish students purportedly swell the ranks of cults in disproportionate numbers to their representation in the overall population.

As students head back to school this fall, Les Baker says: "Parents, be they Jewish parents or whatever, should address the subject of dangerous groups with their children with the same seriousness and importance that they would talk about sex, drugs or alcohol."

A recent university survey of 366 students found that 35 percent of students had been asked to join a group they thought to be a cult; 21 percent of the students knew a peer who had joined an organization they believed to be a cult.

The new edition of KAPLAN/ Newsweek's How to Get into College guide, released earlier this month, includes a section on how "colleges have become prime recruiting grounds for the nation's more than 3,000 cults, which seem to promise security and support to vulnerable students, many away from home and family for the first time."

Baker says he and his wife "knew nothing about destructive groups" or that their daughter, Ellen (the couple has requested that their daughter's real name not be used), was involved in a controversial sect until "we woke up one Sunday morning, and we looked at the Washington Post, and there was an expose on the group with a picture. ...And so, we said, 'Oh my God.'"

The Bethesda couple had been uneasy about their daughter, "because we had seen some dramatic changes in her," Baker says. "We knew about this group that she was very interested in.

"And when she would come to visit, every 10 minutes that she would be at home, the phone would ring and there would be another group member talking with her. So we thought that was unusual, but we couldn't put our finger on it."

When the Bakers learned that their daughter was preparing to go to Iran as a missionary and risk martyrdom in the fundamentalist Islamic country, they arranged non coercive exit-counselling during a ski trip.

Former group members came to their cabin to share their findings about the group's finances and the high lifestyle and earnings of the group's leader. "She was free to leave at any time," Baker says. "The intervention was certainly the most gut-wrenching event in our family life. She made the decision to leave the group." The counselling was successful and Ellen is today working and living in the local area.

Then the details of their daughter's recruitment unfolded. At follow-up counselling in support groups, the Bakers heard similar stories from other parents with children at Maryland state universities and learned that other complaints to university officials had gone ignored, Baker says. The couple became angry.

Ellen had been recruited by her college dormitory resident assistant (RA), or adviser, when she sought advice on a personal problem during the fall of her sophomore year in 1994.

ICOC banned from recruiting

Instead of referring their daughter to a university health system counsellor or another bona fide campus employee, the RA brought in a member of an outside group who recruited Ellen into the Upside Down Club, a registered student group.

But Ellen had no idea at the time that Upside Down was a part of the International Churches of Christ (ICOC), a manipulative, "destructive group," according to Mark Powers, executive director of Jews for Judaism, the Baltimore-based, anti-missionary and anti-cult organization.

The ICOC has been banned from recruiting on a number of private university campuses, according to the Christian Science Monitor. (The ICOC is not related to the mainstream Christian, United Church of Christ.)

Ellen's RA was still serving in her paraprofessional position despite complaints the previous year to both the assistant director of university resident life and the vice president of student affairs about the RA's proselytizing.

Two articles had appeared in the Diamondback student newspaper, outlining cult recruitment tactics and complaints against the RA. The RA, in fact, had been recruited by her own resident assistant.

While in the group – Ellen was involved for little more than a year – she handed her entire $2,322 savings to the group and her grades plummeted, says Baker. She was submitting a daily and weekly schedule of virtually all of her activities to her RA – her "discipler" – for approval.

She was encouraged to sleep less. And she began feeding group recruiters on her campus meal card. The RA had acted as a scribe during a protracted "sin confession" and passed the document on to group leaders. She also organized Ellen's door-to-door dorm recruiting, which is "unlawful," according to university policy.

The RA, in an interview with the Christian Science Monitor, said it was natural for her to discuss her personal interests with fellow dorm residents and that she never unduly pressured students to join in events. A high-ranking church official also said the group deplores deception.

The Bakers have taken their complaints up the long chain of command at the University System of Maryland. Officials have repeatedly refused to investigate his complaints, says Baker, leafing through documents meticulously organized in an alphabetized, thick binder.

University officials note that students and staff have First-Amendment rights to affiliate and participate in any group and may not be denied positions because of any membership.

"The university has a very strongly worded policy relating to the separation of the resident adviser's personal and professional lives," says Warren E. Kelley, executive assistant to University of Maryland, College Park, vice president of student affairs.

Explaining why the university does not ban proselytizing outright, Kelley says, "Trying to tell a student that we are going to prohibit their ability to talk about a topic of personal interest to them just is not enforceable, or practical or desirable. The individual RA also has protections of free speech."

The university's orientation program also warns students about certain sect behaviors without naming specific groups. A brochure, Friends Are Everywhere, gives students information on "making judgments about groups" and is handed out at orientation and available at other locations on campus.

Another brochure, Could this happen to you? A Guide to Making Safe Judgments About Groups, is distributed on campus through the campus ministries. RAs also receive training on dangerous groups.

"What the university has done with resident assistants now is excellent," agrees Baker. But, he says, when he and his wife complained, they were told that not only was the group membership "a good experience for our daughter, but that they were constitutionally constrained from doing...anything regarding it."

fessor Denny Gulick, is sympathetic with the Bakers' plight and has carried on his own campaign to sensitize university officials about cult recruitment.

Long before Ellen was approached, Gulick and another student had notified leading campus administrators about cults' targeting of RA jobs for recruiting access to students and about the specific RA in question.

Gulick became involved in cult-awareness efforts in the mid-1980s when a controversial sect, which he declines to name publicly, moved into his neighborhood within walking distance of the campus. Friends and acquaintances warned him that his three young children could be vulnerable.

He began researching cults. "One thing led to another and the more I knew, the angrier I got. I met people who had lost family members to destructive groups. I could see the pathos. I could see the disorientation of ex-members. I could see the lies, the coercion, the deception by cult people," he says.

"So I went to the university and I said, 'Oh my God, there are cults proselytizing on campus' – sort of like the cockroaches in your kitchen. And I thought they were going to say, 'Get them out!' When in fact, they pretended that there was no such thing," he recalls.

"I had proof that they were there and that they had been there. So, it didn't make any sense. So I said, somebody is covering up; there's a crisis here."

'There's a crisis here'

Over time, Gulick's approach has shifted. "Initially, I thought, 'Get them out! Just get the lawyers and get them out.' And then I realized it's not so simple and that isn't the right kind of approach.

"The right kind of approach is to educate people. If they want to join, so they should be able to join. If you tell them, 'Here's a bridge, be careful,' then you've done your job."

Gulick objects to "apologists" who use the euphemism "new religious movements" or "minority religions" to talk about destructive groups. Such groups oppose the term cult, saying it has a pejorative connotation.

"The whole flock of those representing destructive groups say that a cult is a 'new religious movement.' And that's as phony as the day is long," says Gulick.

"One assistant dean told me, 'One man's cult is another person's Rotary Club.' Well, I'm not a Rotarian, but I took great umbrage at that. A destructive group to my way of thinking is a group that has a hidden agenda of controlling the minds and lives of its members," Gulick says.

He believes that during any given semester on the College Park campus, there are between 50 and 100 students involved in destructive groups.

He now gives the College Park campus "a lot of credit for some new procedures," but says, "There still is some room for increased legitimate [cult-awareness] activity on our campus.

"Still, very few staff know anything about destructive groups. The mental health professionals, the counsellors, the campus police force, the financial people who give student loans" need to be better informed.

Although the Bakers never sued College Park campus officials or the university system, they hired attorney David Bardin of the Arent Fox law firm in Washington, D.C. to prepare a demand letter that accuses the university of misconduct and gross negligence for allowing the RA to stay in her paraprofessional, supervisory position despite the record of harassment complaints.

The Bakers asked for about $7,000 compensation for Ellen's squandered savings and tuition during the time she was a group member. The couple also wanted their daughter to be given special consideration for admittance to a selective graduate school program.

Bardin also argued that labor laws, and a court precedent prohibiting supervisors and employees from soliciting in the workplace and creating a hostile work environment should apply in this case.

The university rejected the Bakers' requests. The university's attorney, Diane Krejsa, wrote that "presumably, in devoting her energies and time to the church rather than her studies, [Ellen] received certain benefits in the form of spiritual nourishment, a meaningful life philosophy and/or individual and communal companionship."

Krejsa also argued that the institution has no legal obligation to stand in loco parentis [in the place of a parent] or oversee a student's "choice of activities, including religion."

Baker says he is particularly disturbed by the "front" names groups use on campus: "The group's point is that they are young students and they don't want to be called [a formal organizational name]. They want to be called something a little more hip. But how can you keep up with names that change frequently? You can't."

Disturbed by 'front' names

Baker says students and parents must be made aware of "smooth" recruitment tactics. Groups use the ploy of world harmony-music concerts, peace-run marathons or volley ball games on the quad to lure in unsuspecting students. Fake dates are set up where good-looking students ask out less-attractive peers and heap on the flattery.

Students need to learn how to scrutinize whether praise and compliments seem inappropriately excessive, says Baker.

"It's only a matter of time before we have another Heaven's Gate or Jonestown. We have to recognize that this is an issue that we have to treat seriously. It's not a religious issue.

"It's an issue of how we as parents help educate our children to make good decisions and be sensitive about the groups they choose or choose not to join."

Merry Madway Eisenstadt, a Washington Jewish Week staff writer, has written about her brother's accidental death indirectly related to his involvement in a controversial group headed by guru Sri Chinmoy.

Bullfighting the arena for York U historian

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

York University historian Adrian Shubert has ventured where few academics dare to go.

He has written a book about bullfighting.

It is not a trivial pursuit.

Bullfighting, he claims, was the first form of commercialized mass leisure in Western society and, therefore, is worthy of scholarly scrutiny.

In Death and Money in the Afternoon: A History of the Spanish Bullfight (Oxford University Press), purportedly the first work in English on the subject by an accredited historian, Shubert argues that bullfighting was a going concern by about 1750, a century before baseball, soccer or cricket gained a foothold in the mass leisure industry.

Bullfighting has been his consuming passion for years. In 1990, when he wrote A Social History of Spain, 1800-1982, Shubert touched on the topic glancingly. From 1994 onward, he delivered a series of papers on the corrida in Canada, the United States and Europe.

But with Death and Money in the Afternoon, published earlier this year, Shubert has established himself as an indisputable maven on the phenomenon. "It will almost certainly be published in Spain," he said. "I've been approached by several Spanish publishers, although the rights are owned by Oxford University Press."

To Shubert, chair of York's history department, bullfighting, before and beyond all else, is a business. "Its purpose, from its inception, was to make money. The bullfight was a cultural industry which brought together a number of groups with divergent interests. Bullfighters, breeders, promoters, critics and fans presented a kaleidoscope of competing interests and fought among themselves for power and profit."

By focusing on bullfighting, Shubert, one of Canada's foremost authorities on Spain, can examine the evolution of Spanish culture and society through the prism of the West's first spectator sport.

Bullfighting, he explained, is as popular today in Spain as it has ever been. Spaniards consider it an indelible and distinguishing aspect of Spanish culture.

"I am neither a fan nor an opponent of bullfighting," said Shubert, who has attended several bullfights. "But it's the single thing most closely identified with Spain."

Spain has intrigued Shubert, 46, for almost 30 years. In 1971, fresh out of high school, he and some friends hitchhiked around Europe for several weeks.

When he reached Spain, he was bowled over. "I had the common romantic reaction." He was captivated not only by the castles and the monuments attesting to Christian, Jewish and Muslim influences, but by the relaxed lifestyle and the varied scenery.

Returning to Canada, Shubert – the son of a doctor – enrolled at the University of Toronto. By chance, one of his professors was William Callahan, then the only specialist in Spanish history at a Canadian university.

Callahan inducted him into the brotherhood of Spanish historians, and Shubert repaid the debt by dedicating Death And Money in the Afternoon to his old teacher. The inscription reads, "To Bill Callahan, for getting me started."

In 1976, Shubert completed an MA degree at the University of New Mexico, submitting a thesis on the nationalization of Spain's oil industry in the 1920s.

Six years later, he finished a PhD at Queen Mary College, University of London. Shubert's dissertation was on a coal miners' labor movement in northern Spain. In 1987, the thesis was published in book form under the title of The Road to Revolution in Spain. The Coal Miners of Asturias, 1860-1934.

Adrian Shubert

Since then, Shubert, who began teaching at York in 1985, has written The Land and People of Spain and Spain at War: the Spanish Civil War in Context, 1931-1939.

In recognition of his contributions to Spanish culture, Spain recently conferred upon him the prestigious Comendador de la Orden de Merito Civil award, which is under the patronage of King Juan Carlos.

Shubert, whose books have been translated into Spanish, visits Spain regularly, usually with his Spanish wife Agueda, who teaches French immersion in a greater Toronto elementary school. They have a daughter and her name is Esther.

Still one of the only historians in Canada whose specialty is Spain, Shubert has often wondered why Canadian academia is so bereft of such specialists.

There is an explanation.

History departments here have traditionally focused on Britain, France and Germany to the exclusion of Spain because it ceased being a great power in the 18th century and thus did not attract much attention.

And due to Britain's former rivalry with Spain, and the existence of anti-Hispanic and anti-Catholic prejudice, Spanish history was underestimated and given short shrift.

To his regret, the status of Spanish studies at Canadian universities is still not what it should be. And for Shubert this is shocking, since Spanish, after English, is North America's most important language.

According to Shubert, Spaniards are increasingly interested in reclaiming Spain's Jewish past and incorporating it into its official history. This interest, he mused, may well be a backlash against the authoritarian Franco era which ended in the 1970s.

Francesco Franco, who ruled Spain for almost four decades, aggressively rejected Spain's Jewish legacy, despite rumors to the effect that his family was of Sephardi origin. He has heard such talk before. "My wife," Shubert said, "claims that most Spaniards have Jewish blood coursing through their veins."

Although Shubert has taken no special interest in the Inquisition or the expulsion of Spanish Jewry in 1492, he believes that the mass exodus of Jews was a factor in Spain's decline as a European power.

Shubert, who was born in Manchester, England, and arrived in Canada as a child with his parents Sydney and Rosetta, has fastened on Baldomero Espartero, a Spaniard, as his next subject of inquiry.

Espartero is certainly an intriguing figure. He was a poor man's son and an army officer who resisted a French invasion in the early 1800s and subsequently defended the Spanish empire in Latin America against Simon Bolivar. Later, he was a general in a Spanish civil war and, finally, he was a deposed regent who, amazingly enough, turned down an offer to be king of Spain.

If Shubert's proposed biography of Espartero is as interesting as his latest work on bullfighting, he will surely do much for the cause of Spanish studies in Canada.

Israeli organization helps women with breast cancer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Nurit Tolnai was diagnosed with breast cancer over six years ago, she realized her needs as a patient weren't being met as well as she would have liked.

She found herself travelling from one city to another in Israel, seeking second opinions, and feeling very much alone, having no friends who had been through the same experience.

"I had a hard time," Tolnai, 52, said during a recent trip to Toronto, where she met with Canadian Cancer Society representatives.

She was in Canada to speak in Ottawa at the World Conference on Breast Cancer earlier this summer, and also spoke at Montreal's Temple Emanu-El Beth Shalom, which runs a small group for breast cancer survivors.

If, as Tolnai says, the situation is now better for other Israeli women with breast cancer, it's likely due at least in part to her efforts as founder and executive director of One in Nine Women for Women with Cancer.

The organization, a grantee of the New Israel Fund, offers information and support. It was established in 1994, following interviews with Tolnai in the Israeli media on the difficulties faced by women with breast cancer. Other women began to contact her with their own stories, advice and frustrations.

The name refers to a statistic – one in nine Israeli women will be diagnosed with breast cancer.

(The same statistic applies to Canada, although the average age at which cancer is diagnosed in Jewish women in Israel is 47, compared to 64 for Jewish women in other western countries.)

Tolnai takes particular pride in her organization's name, which has become a catchphrase in Israel for referring to breast cancer.

"Calling the group One in Nine was a really good idea," Tolnai said. "We're increasing awareness just by having the name."

A graduate of Israel's Bezalel art academy, Tolnai's creative energy – she has a background in ceramics, sculpture and performing arts – eventually led her to develop a program for drug addicts in withdrawal, incorporating movement, bioenergy, a spiritual component and the 12-step recovery model. She gave up the project when One in Nine got off the ground.

After her diagnosis, Tolnai continued to juggle work, single motherhood, her own recovery and the fledgling One in Nine, which she initially ran out of her home.

Her two-year battle with breast cancer included two biopsies, a mastectomy, reconstructive surgery using implants, and further surgery due to complications from the implants.

Tolnai would love to work with Israeli doctors to help them understand their patients' needs – such as access to information, receiving their diagnosis in a sensitive manner and having the right to pursue a second opinion from a doctor of their own choosing – but for now she is focusing on empowering breast cancer patients.

Another issue is that the majority of the Israeli medical establishment does not accept complementary treatment, she said.

While in Toronto, Tolnai was impressed to see that Mount Sinai Hospital's Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre offers Reiki, reflexology and "nice music. They have a more holistic way of looking at things."

Tolnai had her own problems with the medical establishment. Following her original implant surgery, she was convinced something was wrong. She felt unwell and suffered terrible pain. Even breathing was difficult. Her doctor told her, "Anatomically, everything is okay." They weren't even speaking the same language, Tolnai felt.

Other women had complaints about their doctors, too.

They called from all over Israel, and Tolnai discovered they had a need to talk, but limited opportunity. "Some women could only talk ...when their husbands weren't home and their children were sleeping. There are so many situations where women can't talk."

Tolnai established a hotline, which now gets over 100 calls a month. She also set up what was probably Israel's first support group for breast cancer patients, with a social worker as facilitator.

Today, One in Nine operates out of an office in Tel Aviv, with a small staff and 60 volunteers running support and awareness programs.

Mental health professionals from Israel visit Montreal

MONTREAL — An Israeli delegation of 19 mental health professionals recently visited Montreal to examine social services provided by the Jewish community and the province.

During their week-long stay, the delegates attended workshops on four predominant themes: poverty and employment, immigration and acculturation, services to seniors, and family violence and families and children at risk.

"Both the Montreal Jewish community and the province of Quebec operate a very efficient and serviceable network of agencies," said Esther Amar, co-chair of the Israeli delegation. "We hope to exchange the unique knowledge that both of our communities have acquired in order to better understand the needs of our society."

"This is an unbelievable opportunity for us to combine our shared professional knowledge as a collective," said Irit Inbar, the other delegation co-chair.

The Israelis met with 15 Montrealers who were guests at similar seminars in Beersheva and Bnei Shimon this past June.

"Our experience in Israel has not only influenced the kind of work we do, but has opened new opportunities for collaboration, professional exchange and improved service responses," said Linda Kislowicz, director of Jewish Family Services.

Itzhak Marciano is the honorary chair of the Beersheva-Bnei Shimon Mental Health Professionals delegation, and deputy mayor of Beersheva in charge of social projects.

The mental health exchange is a program of Partnership 2000, an initiative of FEDERATION CJA, which links Montreal to the municipality of Beersheva and the Bnei Shimon regional council to foster learning relationships and opportunities for Jews in Israel and Canada.

Israel & the Jewish World

The Toronto Jewish community is not generally known as a warm community. Just ask a newcomer to our town. Generally 'the stranger' has a hard time meeting people, and receiving a whole hearted welcome. This Rosh Hashanah, one of our challenges might be to open our hearts and our homes to 'the stranger'. Invite over a newcomer. Introduce yourself to the person in shul who looks alone. Remember, we were once strangers in a strange land. We knew what it was like. It's lonely. L'shana Tova!

PA Chairman sells 'well-known merchandise'

World leaders buy Arafat's independence threat

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Time after time over the past year, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat has sold his well-known merchandise: the threat to unilaterally declare an independent Palestinian state.

Analysis

He sold it to U.S. President Bill Clinton, he sold it to the European Union and he sold it to Benjamin Netanyahu. Now Arafat has found a new buyer: Ehud Barak.

And like all his predecessors, Barak, too, is compelled to give the Palestinian leader something, in order to maintain the status quo and not wake up one fine day to the new reality of an independent state with international recognition.

A senior Israeli source explained recently that Barak's principal achievement in the new agreement, which is on the verge of being signed, is in setting a timetable for the permanent settlement.

"There is no more target date for the unilateral declaration of a state," the senior source said, "and that is in the face of all the American and European commitments."

The source added that the Palestinians are very punctilious about the legal validity of the declaration of their state and will not act contrary to signed agreements or the opinions of the top international jurists.

The Palestinians have agreed that until the permanent settlement is finalized, the Oslo accords will remain in force, and they will take no unilateral steps that would alter the status of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. In return, they received "quality" areas from Barak in the West Bank, which will reinforce the territorial continuity of the Palestinian state, if and when it is established. And they also received other gifts: more prisoners released, the onset of work on the Gaza seaport and the activation of the safe passage routes between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Arafat had to agree to one demand put forward by the prime minister, namely the splitting of the permanent settlement into two parts: a framework agreement, to be signed this winter, which will declare the termination of the conflict between the two peoples; and a detailed, comprehensive settlement to come afterward. Barak abandoned his original demand, which was to link the framework agreement to the completion of the IDF's withdrawals under the Wye accord.

Barak had no freedom to manoeuvre. He conducted the negotiations with his hands tied by the legacy left him by Benjamin Netanyahu, in the form of a letter of guarantee that Clinton sent to Arafat on April 26. In the letter, which was given to the Palestinians as a reward for refraining from declaring independence, the president set forth two targets: a summit meeting with the prime minister and Arafat at year's end, and intensive negotiations on a permanent settlement, to be concluded "within a year."

Before the elections, the message was taken to mean that the United States' target date for the permanent settlement is May 2000. Following Barak's victory, the Americans loosened the rope a little and announced that, according to their interpretation, the year allotted for intensive negotiations will begin the day negotiations get under way. Barak tried to get this interpretation from the Americans in writing, but he was turned down. The administration stuck to the vague formulation.

The result was that the American formulation was translated into the clauses of the new agreement, which will stipulate that the comprehensive agreement will be concluded "within a year from the start of the permanent-status talks," without setting a specific date. The new target date for concluding the permanent settlement is September 2000. Barak, then, gained four months.

Historic Jewish cemetery restored in Venice

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VENICE — One of the oldest and historically most important Jewish cemeteries in Europe is reopening as a cultural monument after having languished virtually abandoned for centuries.

Just after the High Holy Days, Venice's historic old Jewish cemetery will be formally opened to the public, following an intensive, 1½-year-long restoration and conservation effort.

Mayor Massimo Cacciari and other officials will attend the dedication ceremony Oct. 13, which will be followed by a gala reception at the Doge's Palace.

The cemetery, founded in 1386, is one of the treasures of European Jewish heritage. Nearly 200 years ago, the poets Byron and Shelley used to go horseback riding there and were struck by its haunting desolation.

"Now that the cemetery has been restored, we plan to enable tourists to visit it on a limited basis, perhaps on two or three designated days a week," said a representative of Venice's 500-member Jewish community.

The internationally funded restoration project was directed by the Venice Jewish community and the Superintendent of Monuments for Venice. It was funded through a public-private partnership, with major support coming from Venice's regional government and the private preservation organizations Save Venice and the World Monuments Fund.

The massive effort included the repair, cleansing and restoration of hundreds of centuries-old tombstones, as well as the drainage of swampy areas, clearing of weeds, bushes and undergrowth, and repair of the walls. All tombstones were also painstakingly documented and photographed.

Scores of stones that had lain face down were placed in a standing position, and fragments of monuments have been hung securely on the perimeter walls.

In addition, more than 100 tombstones that had sunk or been buried underground were discovered.

Located at the northern end of the Lido – the long strip of island that protects Venice from the Adriatic Sea – near the church of San Nicolo, the cemetery was founded after Venice's doge (chief magistrate) invited Jews from the mainland to settle in Venice as bankers, following a war between Venice and Genoa.

Its oldest known tombstone, that of Samuel son of Samson, dates from 1389, decades before the earliest identified tombstone in the famous Old Jewish Cemetery in Prague.

For four centuries, the ancient cemetery served as the only burial ground for Venetian Jews. Funerals took place in convoys of gondolas that set sail from the Jewish ghetto, at the northern edge of Venice.

Time and time again, its area was decreased, its walls torn down, or its tombstones uprooted to build fortifications along the Lido shore.

The cemetery was finally abandoned in about 1770, and a newer cemetery, which is still in use today, was opened nearby.

The earliest stones are simple slabs bearing epitaphs, but later ones are lavishly carved with coats of arms, elaborate baroque decorative elements and vivid symbols representing family names or Jewish iconography, including Kabalistic designs.

Many of the decorative elements, such as the heraldic coats of arms, show the strong influence of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews who settled in Venice after the expulsions from Iberia.

There are a surprising number of representations of the human figure, including cupids with wings, representations of Samson, and an apparent family crest showing a woman on top of a tower.

Several carvings show two nude men carrying an enormous bunch of grapes – an illustration of the story from the Book of Numbers in which two spies sent by Moses to investigate the fertility of the Promised Land found a cluster of grapes so big that it took two men to carry it.

Another shows a bird carrying the deceased toward heaven.

One of the historically most interesting markers is a small, simple stone bearing the inscription "Jews 1631." It marks the mass grave of an unknown number of Jews killed in the plague that swept Venice in 1630-31.

Nearby is the tombstone of Rabbi Leone da Modena (1571-1648), one of the most fascinating Jewish figures of the 16th and 17th centuries, whose autobiography gives a vivid picture of Jewish life in Venice at that time.

Israeli Arab arrested

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – An Israeli Arab from the Galilee has been arrested in the double murder of an Israeli couple near Megiddo last week.

Police lifted a ban on disclosing details of the case, identifying the suspect as Abdallah Salakh Agbariyeh, 20, of the village of Musheirifa, located not far from the site of the murders.

According to police, Agbariyeh confessed to stabbing to death Sharon Steinmetz, 21, and her boyfriend Yehiel-Shai Feinfeter, 26. Agbariyeh told police investigators he acted alone and had intended to murder Jews.

For singles in Israel, few places to meet

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Bureau

JERUSALEM — Sitting opposite a complete stranger, Ilana Kelson is trying to describe her ideal mate. And she's not alone. Tucked away in an Orthodox synagogue in Jerusalem's Old Katamon neighborhood, there are 25 couples having the same conversation.

At the front of this large airy room sit Rosalie and Efraim Eisen, an Oregon couple who specialize in helping Jews find their soul mates.

Who would think it would be difficult for a nice Jewish boy to meet a nice Jewish girl in Israel? But with more than 50,000 unmarried people aged 25 to 44 in Jerusalem, Haifa and Tel Aviv, that is the reality.

On a recent Saturday, Jewish singles – among them Kelson – flocked to the synagogue to participate in a workshop designed specifically for them – Jewish singles looking for a match.

During their introduction to the group, the Eisens say they knew when they met each other, that it was meant to be, that it was bashert – they were soul mates. Now, they've made it their goal to help others find their intendeds.

That an American couple has to come to Israel to help out the local Jewish singles scene may sound a bit silly. But Liaura Zacharie, founder and director of Eden 2000, a Jerusalem non-profit cultural centre that sponsors singles events, including the Eisens' workshop, says the local singles issue isn't being dealt with sufficiently.

"Judaism revolves around family and it becomes an impossible mission to be single and religious and stay here," says Zacharie, a French immigrant who began her seven-year-old organization after so many of her friends started to leave Israel because they couldn't find mates.

"It's not like in the States [and Canada] where you open any newspaper and it will have tens of events for singles. Here you can open all the newspapers together [and only a few events are being offered]. There's nownere for people to meet," she says.

"For the Jewish state, the citizens are the main assets. We don't have gold, we don't have fuel, we have people... We're supposed to care about others, and so little is done."

"God says it is not good to be alone," Efraim Eisen says in an interview the day before the workshop. Rosalie nods in agreement.

The Eisens, who were both previously married, met in 1991 in Philadelphia at the Jewish Renewal Kallah, a gathering of the Jewish Renewal movement. Concerned about Jewish continuity and about the lack of opportunities for singles to connect spiritually, they developed the Bashert Workshop.

For the past seven years they have been presenting it to groups across North America. Though their first workshop was held in Vancouver, they have not been back to Canada since then. This recent workshop was the first one they offered in Israel.

The couple's matchmaking plans came out of the kindling of their own romance. Both were single parents looking for companionship. Both lived in small Jewish communities in Oregon, 180 miles apart.

"People knew we were looking to meet someone," says Efraim, a marriage and family therapist for 18 years. He and Rosalie married just four months after they met. "No one tried to connect us," he said. "We knew it was important to create a new vehicle for people to meet."

Their goal is simple: to help Jewish singles find their bashert – the Hebrew word for beloved, partner, intended, or soul mate. The Eisens believe that everyone has a bashert.

Their workshop combines stories, Torah teachings, music and guided imagery as a means of teaching relationship skills. While it is not aimed at a specific community, most of their participants are from the modern-Orthodox stream.

Rebecca Auerbach, 32, says she attended the workshop because she wanted to see how the Eisens could help her achieve one of her goals – "to find the right person for me to marry."

To do that, the Eisens say "one must know one's soul to find one's soul mate." Through probing questions and group discussions, the Eisens try to help participants open up.

"We try to help people look beyond physical characteristics, to refrain from the love-at-first-sight myth," says Rosalie.

Auerbach, who classifies herself as modern Orthodox, agrees with their philosophy. "You have to be happy with who you are. If you're always trying to figure out yourself, you're never going to know who's right for you."

"They definitely are focusing on issues that a lot of people don't want to deal with and recognize," says Ilana Kelson, 30, who attended the Eisens' mid-week and Saturday-night workshops.

"A lot of people don't want to deal with the idea that it's not just about magically meeting someone and falling in love, but it's much more about doing your own work, Kelson says. "You've got to be ready to be honest with yourself and with other people."

During the four-hour workshop, Rosalie, 49, and Efraim, 50, ask people to pair up and talk about such topics as a perfect Sabbath, an event one is anticipating, and the most awesome thing that happened in the last year. Then they take a step back "so people can meet each other."

At the end of synagogue services every Friday night and Saturday afternoon, the streets in the Old Katamon neighborhood of Jerusalem fill with hundreds of young people. The men, in clean, white button-downs and slacks, and women, in long skirts or dresses, stand in small groups, chatting. There are hardly any families among the crowd. This is a group of singles.

It's never announced and it's not planned, but it happens every week. This swarm of people, mainly English-speakers, meet outside Yakar, the synagogue on the corner, as well as at another five or so synagogues in the neighborhood.

While it looks like a friendly and harmless community, Zacharie of Eden 2000, says it's one with a lot of frustration.

"I don't think these people can tell you they're happy. They try to live those years the best they can being alone. [But] they hope the day will come when they won't be single anymore," she says.

Zacharie, and her deputy, D'vora Greisman, a Canadian-Israeli who directs the organization's English-speaking events, say that while the group looks large, it is from here that many people leave Israel to search elsewhere for mates.

"Everyone knows everyone," says Roni Kaplan, 29, who attended the Bashert Workshop. "It's hard to date someone who's already dated five of your friends."

The Eisens believe the singles problem can be overcome if people let down their defences and break down their walls.

"There are so many beautiful people here," says Rosalie. "We're trying to get people to look into each other's eyes."

Jews rejoice at Torah dedication near Auschwitz

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — Almost 60 years to the day after the outbreak of World War II, the shofar sounded and Jews danced with the Torah in the southern Polish town where the Auschwitz death camp was located.

The occasion was an emotional ceremony in Oswiecim on Monday that combined joy, tears, memory and hope, as a Torah flown across the Atlantic from the United States was installed in the only synagogue left standing in the town after the Holocaust.

"It was an extremely emotional ceremony; very emotional for us all," Daniel Eisenstadt, executive director of the New York-based Auschwitz Jewish Centre Foundation, told JTA by phone.

The specially commissioned Torah was brought to Oswiecim by about three dozen members of the Orthodox Cherry Lane Minyan of Great Neck, N.Y., who donated it to the Foundation, which is sponsoring the transformation of the synagogue and an adjoining house into a Jewish study and prayer center.

The Lomdei Mishnaot Synagogue, a small, compact building with arched windows, was built around 1900 and – as one of about a dozen pre-war synagogues in Oswiecim – was used until 1939.

World War II was triggered when the Germans invaded Poland on Sept. 1, 1939.

The Nazis brought thousands of Jews to the synagogue before they deported them to ghettos in 1941. After World War II, it was seized by the Communists and used as a warehouse, and in March 1998 it became the first building returned to the Jewish community under Poland's restitution law.

The dedication ceremony for the Torah was an affirmative symbol for the future as well as a defiant demonstration of Jewish survival.

"We danced in with the Torah scroll under a chupah," Eisenstadt said, "and inside the synagogue we all danced with the Torah for about 45 minutes. It was wonderful."

Women as well as men danced with the $25,000 scroll, which is covered by a red velvet mantle decorated with a tree growing out of a flame.

Then, the Cherry Lane Minyan's Rabbi Marvin Tokayer led the traditional siyum ceremony, which began with a blast from the shofar. Each participant added a letter to complete the writing of the new scroll.

Among those taking part was Moshe Klueger, a Holocaust survivor from Oswiecim now living on Long Island, who had become a bar mitzvah in the synagogue. Klueger's brother Shimon is the only Jew still living in Oswiecim, which before the war had about 7,000 Jews making up more than half the local population.

Moshe Klueger broke down in tears, but also danced joyously with the Torah.

"The last time he had been there was before the war, praying with his father," Eisenstadt said.

Several adult children and teenage grandchildren of Holocaust survivors also took part, as well as about 50 members of the current Polish Jewish community, which has seen a revival in the decade since the fall of communism.

A number of local officials and townspeople also attended the ceremony.

People involved in the ceremony stressed the symbolic meaning of bringing a new Torah to the town whose name has become the symbol of the Holocaust.

"A synagogue without a Torah is just four walls," Tokayer said before the ceremony.

Bridge disaster victims to receive compensation

By AKIVA ELDAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — More than two years after the tragic bridge collapse at the Maccabiah Games, the Israeli government announced it would compensate members of the Australian delegation injured in the incident.

The announcement was sent last week to the Haifa District Court, which is deliberating a series of claims against the insurance companies, contractors and other sources. The claims were brought by the families of those killed and injured in the fiasco.

In July of 1997, four participants in the Maccabiah Games were killed when a specially constructed footbridge leading to the stadium collapsed.

The treasury will soon determine the exact amount of compensation, and informed sources have mentioned that the amount will be in the tens of millions of shekels.

The decision was made at a discussion in the office of Finance Minister Avraham Shochat, which was attended by representatives from the foreign and justice ministries.

The Foreign Ministry suggested taking the unusual step of offering state compensation in order to repair relations with the Australian Jewish community, which had complained of the disappearance of those involved in the affair and of evasion of responsibility by Israeli officials.

Ministry sources expressed the hope that the decision would put an end to the procrastination in the bargaining over compensation, and would lead to an arrangement with the insurance companies and other non-judicial actors in the affair.

The decision came in the wake of the suggestion by Judge Shmuel Berliner, who ruled on the majority of claims put forth by the families of those involved. He asked that "the state take upon itself...to pay fair compensation to the victims of the disaster."

Some families (such as those of Sasha Elterman) had to personally finance the medical treatment that their relatives had to undergo.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 30

• Garbage and broken glass were strewn at the entrance to the Ashkenazi cemetery in Hebron, in what Jewish settlers claimed was the latest desecration of the site by Palestinians. The cemetery is the burial site of the granddaughter of the founder of the Chabad movement.

Aug. 31

• Israel welcomed a decision by Jordanian officials to crack down on Hamas operations in the Hashemite kingdom. "Hamas is not a threat just to Israel. It is a threat to the Palestinian Authority, and to the Jordanians," cabinet member Haim Ramon said. His comment came one day after Jordanian security forces shut Hamas offices in Amman, detained several of the group's activists and issued arrest warrants for four of its leaders.

Sept. 1

• An Israeli computer hacker known as The Analyzer, Ehud Tanenbaum, and three other friends pleaded not guilty to charges of illegally entering the computers of the Pentagon, NASA and American universities. A fifth defendant pleaded guilty and was expected to serve as a witness for the prosecution.

Sept. 2

• Life returned to normal for residents of northern Israel who had spent the night in bomb shelters out of concern that Katyusha rockets could land there after two Lebanese civilians were killed Wednesday. The IDF said the two civilians had been killed by the South Lebanese Army.

• Israel Television's Channel 1 conducted a six-hour telethon to raise funds for victims of last month's earthquake in Turkey. The broadcast was co-ordinated by the Foreign Ministry.

Sept. 3

• Israel announced that the Miami Heat of the National Basketball Association would play an exhibition game in Tel Aviv on Oct. 11.

Ambassador David Sultan's New Year's greeting to the Jewish Community of Canada

On the eve of our New Year, I would like to wish you a happy, healthy and prosperous year.

This New Year starts with many hopes and expectations for the realization of peace between us and our neighbors. We will pray and we will do our utmost so that these hopes and expectations will not be in vain. As we advance toward peace, fateful and painful decisions must be taken. We will have to face many challenges including the challenge of those who do not want to see the achievement of peace. We will have to muster all our strength to win the battle for peace while maintaining all that is essential for us and all that is dear to us in our homeland and our eternal capital Jerusalem. For that purpose we will need all the strength deriving from the unity and solidarity of our entire people both in Israel and around the world.

Also on our list of priorities will be the effort to promote our internal unity, bearing in mind that all the differences that exist among us, whether in Israel or in the Diaspora, are after all, secondary to what we share and have in common.

We have recently witnessed the resurgence of the ugly face of hatred towards Jews. Acts and expressions that we all thought were part of the past, surfaced again as if nothing in the world has changed. If the world has not changed, the Jewish people have definitely changed. We are not defenceless. The Jewish people are stronger than ever before. We will not be intimidated by hate and crimes of hate.

May 5760 be a year of peace, a good year in every respect for each and every one of you. Shanah Tovah.

Community Rosh Hashanah greetings from Moshe Ronen, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress

On welcoming the New Year, we rededicate ourselves to ensure that our sisters and brothers all over the world lead free, secure and comfortable lives, replete with Jewish fulfilment.

Whenever and wherever their lives fall short of this ideal, we, together with our fellow Jews, will be there for them, spiritually and culturally to uplift and physically to protect and ameliorate their plight. Likewise, because it is the Jewish way, we will make our presence felt where human rights are violated and tragedies strike.

A vibrant, prosperous and compassionate state of Israel sets the example and makes it all the easier for us to carry out these mitzvot. Israel is our beloved beacon. May the coming year at long last be the one which brings the much anticipated peace between Israel and its immediate Arab neighbors, a peace which is just, secure and true to our Jewish heritage.

In Canada, as elsewhere, we have not been immune from the grotesque acts of hatemongers. That is why Canadian Jewish Congress stresses the importance of security awareness and assists Jewish institutions in addressing their security responsibilities. One can never attain full security, but if we all do our part, risks to our community will be that much reduced.

As Canadian Jews we have much to be thankful for. We are the proud citizens of the country which the United Nations itself, more than once, has recognized as having the highest quality of life in the world.

Canada's democracy, its commitment to social justice and the rule of law, and the strength it derives from the diversity of its people through its official policy of multiculturalism, have made it possible for the Jewish community to be one of the most thriving in the Diaspora.

May our community, with God's help, continue to progress and flourish, and may each and everyone of you be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace.

Shanah Tovah.

Ashkenaz

Dance drama at its best

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The art of dance drama at its best was presented at Ashkenaz with Holocaust Stories, which included The Jewish Wife, based on the play by Bertolt Brecht, and Magda, based on two short stories by Cynthia Ozick.

The performance of Holocaust Stories at the Premiere Dance Theatre at Harbourfront Centre, choreographed by Gabrielle Lansner, brought a new dimension to the literary art of the two writers.

Through dance and body movements, Lansner was able to illuminate the irony of the Jewish wife in Berlin packing up to leave a Nazi-enamored husband who did not answer his wife's plea, "Should I stay?"

Each in turn, Dee Pelletier as The Wife and Christopher Reade Mattox as The Husband, mimicked the comments of German friends that the wife would no longer be able to play bridge with their foursome or go to the movies with them.

The comments were delivered with a smirk, as the characters were seen through a chair that looked like a TV screen; it was an act of genius on the choreographer's part.

The Wife's understanding of the reality of the situation becomes clear when she tells her husband, "You are the chief surgeon at the clinic and they cut you to your face," and later, "I've already heard you say the percentage of Jewish scientists is not so great. You are always objective at the first."

At another point, the wife asks, "What is wrong with the shape of my nose and the color of my hair?"

The dancers tell the story of the tall, stiff-legged husband and the more compliant wife as they dance in happier times.

But the drama starts with a chilling noise and a Yahrzeit lamp that foretell the unhappy ending and the Holocaust to follow.

In Magda, the two women dancers tell the heart-rending story of an aunt who loses her baby in the Holocaust because her niece, who is travelling with her, takes the shawl used for hiding the baby from the Nazis.

The niece (Paula McGonagle) says she needs the shawl for warmth, but the aunt (Gretchen Lee Krich) cries out time and again that it was an act of jealousy.

It is a grim tale, made even more so by the silent screams of the aunt and niece as they watch horrified while a German seizes the baby and hurls it against an electrified fence.

The bare stage and minimum number of props in both plays add to the starkness of events.

Holocaust Stories carried out the Ashkenaz mandate – to stage the best in Jewish art.

Margolin satirizes Jewish life

TORONTO — In her sold-out show at Ashkenaz, Deb Margolin satirized the foibles of Jewish life without going too far, although she came close to it at times.

"I love hanging around Jewish people, it cuts my work in half," she quipped.

Her one-woman show, O Wholly Night and Other Jewish Solecisms, which she also wrote, satirized the foibles of Jewish life.

"I love all Jewish professionals, even endodontists," she said.

Her eye-rolling mannerisms, as she imitated the voice of a booming matron, held the audience's interest as she cavorted around the stage, first as a preschooler in a Talmud Torah and then as a mother cuddling her daughter as if her life depended on it.

The Margolin show is an example of cutting-edge humor by an actor who knows that stand-up comedy is not enough for a sophisticated Jewish audience. They want the rationale for the comedy in terms of Jewish intellect.

She did this effectively with the theme of waiting for the Messiah. "Will it be done in one shot, or will we need Messiah boosters?" she asked.

Jewish people sit on a fire escape watching the world go by, waiting for the Messiah, knowing that the Messiah may turn out to be the courier who takes an extra minute or two to deposit his parcels in a convenient spot for the customer, she said.

RARE BOOKS ON MIDDLE EAST

Sotheby's Auction House of London is preparing to auction off an outstanding collection of some 10,000 volumes about the Middle East and Arabic culture, language, history, exploration, archeology, art and economics. The books belonged to Dr. Robert Michael Burrell (1943-1999), a former lecturer on the Middle East at the School of Oriental and African Studies.

The collection includes an assortment of letters by the painter Sir Robert Ker Porter as he travelled through the Persian Gulf. It also includes a rare first edition of Innermost Asia, describing the third scientific expedition of Sir Aurel Stein in 1913-16.

The Personal Narrative of a Pilgrimage to El-Medinah and Meccah records the travels of Sir Richard Francis Burton, while Travels to the City of the Caliphs describes James Wellsted's voyages devoted to surveying the Red Sea, Arabia and Oman between 1830 and 1837.

Each of these volumes is expected to fetch roughly £2,500.

The collection also includes first editions of two famous ninth-century astrological texts by Albumasar, which are expected to bring in as much as £10,000.

The sale occurs at Sotheby's London headquarters on Oct. 14.

Broadway Melody of 1999: Veteran actor Allan Price, who has appeared in numerous shows at the Leah Posluns Theatre, is teaming with veteran concert artist Michael Leach, a staff member at York University, to offer Broadway Melody, a fall course that focuses on teaching some musical classics of the Great White Way in a relaxed, fun atmosphere.

The course will appeal to those who enjoy singing along in a supportive group setting. No experience is necessary and all ability levels are welcome.

Each session in the nine-week course features numerous songs selected from the great Broadway composers and lyricists. Participants will also learn some of the history of Broadway and its many colorful characters.

Cost is $150 plus GST, with discounts for couples or groups. 11 Glen Cameron Rd. (just east of Yonge and south of Clark). Monday evenings from Sept. 27 to Nov. 29. 905-764-5695 or 905-886-9594.

Koffler Gallery: A Jewish artist born in post-war Germany and now residing in London, England, Lily Markiewicz's art deals with questions of cultural identity and displacement. Her compositions mix architectural structures, large photographic images and audio components.

Her exhibit, Promise, opened recently at the Koffler Gallery where it is on view through Oct. 24. Opening reception, Sept. 16, 7 to 9 p.m. Artist talk, Sept. 16, 8 p.m. 4588 Bathurst St. Toronto 636-1880, ext. 268.

Shakespearean Video: Actress Claire Bloom has performed many of Shakespeare's women during her distinguished career. Lovers of the Bard may enjoy Shakespeare's Women, a new feature video in which Bloom discusses the various challenges of playing Juliet, Ophelia, Portia, Rosalind, Imogen, Emilia and Volumnia.

The video, produced by First Run Features, also shows Bloom playing these roles in past performances, and reading many of the soliloquies again.

Also from the same company: And Baby Makes Two, a documentary about a group of eight single working women in New York City who decide to have children on their own.

Vienna Memoirs: Elizabeth Welt Trahan, a Berlin-born American retired educator, has written a memoir recollecting her childhood experiences in Vienna. Walking with Ghosts: A Jewish Childhood in Wartime Vienna recalls the nightmarish world of Hitler's Vienna and tells the story of the maturing process of a young girl during those shattering times. $32.95 US. Peter Lang Publishing, 212-647-7706.

Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

THE PLEASURES OF NEW YORK CITY

In the steeply vertical reaches of the Upper East Side, the blue awninged Fifth Avenue Synagogue is a relatively narrow structure tucked neatly into the sedate and orderly fabric of East 62nd Street.

Boasting Orthodox sanctuaries on several floors – Sephardim on the second, Ashkenazim on the third – this urban temple seems to be organized as efficiently as a department store.

But even in the Ashkenazi sanctuary, the shoebox shape insists upon the Sephardi arrangement of pulpit in the middle, pews on either side facing north and south. During prayer the reverent turn to the East, facing the East River and Jerusalem.

Around the corner at 840 Fifth Ave. and 63rd Street, the Temple Emanu-El sits like a colossus bestriding New York's most elegant avenue. Home to the world's largest Reform congregation (just as New York City is the centre of the world's largest urban Jewish community), Emanu-El is Judaism's answer to St. Patrick's Cathedral, the confident monument that Catholicism erected a short distance down the street.

Whereas St. Patrick's exterior projects an old-fashioned, serious-minded Gothic piety, our more emancipated Emanu-El toys with Art Deco.

And the interior? According to Francis Morrone's fine Architectural Guidebook to New York City (McGraw-Hill, 1998), Temple Emanu-El "is the one place in New York that looks most like a set for a Cecil B. DeMille biblical spectacle."

In particular, the mosaics in its auditorium are said to be spectacular. But Emanu-El was always closed whenever I passed by; a sign directed visitors to a small minyan a few blocks further on. (Who says you can always get whatever you want, whenever you want, in New York?)

After an absence from Manhattan of several years, I felt I had to reacquaint myself with the city's unique layout, institutions, buildings and bridges. So I went to Pier 43 (W. 42nd Street at the Hudson River) and boarded a Circle Line cruise ship for the three-hour full Island tour of Manhattan's 35 miles of coastline ($22).

Inspecting this magical island of skyscrapers from its watery circumference is an exhilarating experience. We floated downtown, turned left at the World Trade Centre, and looped back uptown via the East River, sequentially passing Brooklyn, Queens, Roosevelt Island, the leafy heights of Harlem, the Bronx, the Palisades of Jersey and back to the west side.

What history, what personality, is concentrated on this tiny isle! For me, the highlight came when we nosed up close to Ellis Island and the Statue of Liberty – icons of freedom that are particularly rich with significance for the Jewish world.

I took another perspective of the island by riding to the top of the Empire State Building, which offers a great view from a midtown location 86 stories high. But it's no less crowded and congested in this rarefied atmosphere than down below. The elevators are crowded too, and the line-ups are frustrating and time consuming.

Strolling through midtown one day, I visited a few Judaica stores: Eichler's at 62 W. 45th St., Ziontalis at 29 W. 35th St., and J. Levine Co., a century-old New York institution currently headquartered at 5 W. 30th St. Great merchandise, but the prices? Not bad, but bear in mind that there are no bargains for Canadians shopping in the United States.

Craving culture, I crammed the Museum of Modern Art, the Guggenheim and the Metropolitan Museum of Art into an afternoon. Craving theatre, I saw Annie Get Your Gun, an entertaining re-creation of Irving Berlin's Broadway confection of 1946.

Finally, craving rest, I returned home ... to the Pierre, the elegant monument anchoring the south-eastern corner of Central Park at Fifth & 61st. Built in 1930, the Pierre is refined, comfortable and prestigious. A luxury hotel in a prime upscale neighborhood, it is one of relatively few establishments anywhere with elevator operators on duty around the clock.

Coming home to this Four Seasons property after a tiring day is as sweet an experience as the plate of delicate chocolates awaiting me in my room.

Increased fan appeal

Team sailing: quicker, with more strategy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Soccer's gone indoors in a bid to speed up the game and attract more fans.

So has football, which is one of North America's fastest-growing sports.

So why not sailing?

Sailing, you say?

No, sailboats have not suddenly sprouted wheels and begun tacking around dingy inner-city arenas. But the sport has taken a page out of the books of well-established fan-favored spectacles, and taken steps to increase its appeal among modern spectators. New rules in team sailing allow for quicker action, more strategy and increased fan appeal – all within sight of the fans onshore.

Adam Bookman loves the new team sailing races – and it's not just because he's good at it.

Bookman, along with three other Canadian sailors, recently finished seventh out of 18 teams at the Indigo ISAF World Team Racing Championships at the Royal St. George Yacht Club in Dublin, Ireland.

New Zealand, USA 2 and Great Britain 1 were the top three finishes in order.

Bookman, 27, enjoys the teamwork and strategy that are an integral part of team sailing.

Unlike more traditional sailing races, the 14-foot FJ boats don't necessarily win because they're the fastest.

Team sailing requires speed but tactical maneuvering and working as a team – "like a chess game on the water" – are crucial, he said.

Bookman knew before leaving for Ireland that the traditional team sailing powers like the United States and Britain, would be tough to beat.

"It's a newer sport in Canada," he explained.

Furthermore, there were the results from the last world championships in Miami to consider. In February 1998, Bookman and the rest of the Canadian team finished ninth. "To move from ninth to third would have been a very big jump," he said. "There are a lot of good teams."

The races themselves are a departure from the image of sailboats taking to the seas and spending hours miles from shore, all to get a slight wind advantage to round a buoy and return to the finish line miles apart. Not exactly a riveting spectacle.

In team racing, "the races are right off shore, they take 15 minutes each and they'll probably do 100 a day," Bookman said.

"You have to change your mentality," he continued. "It's not about your own record. It's about your team record. Self-sacrifice is required."

Teammates will move back in the pack just to be able to get in a position to take an opponent's wind, slow them and prevent their team from accumulating too many points, he said.

It's quick paced, has lots of action and each boat has to have a woman on board – a real sport for the '90s, he added.

Despite his involvement in team sailing at the highest levels, Bookman still participates in traditional sailing races. A graduate of sailing programs at the Island Yacht Club, Bookman has been on Ontario and Canadian championship teams, sailing as a youth in a "byte," a small boat.

Prior to the last Olympics, he worked out in 470s, a two-person boat, but he and his partner Rob Fear finished fourth in Canada and didn't qualify for the Games.

Since the 1996 Olympics, Bookman has gone into freelance sailing and instructing. He's coached the Canadian and American youth sailing teams and he holds classes in Toronto, Montreal, Boston and at Michigan State University.

He's also coached the Ontario sailing team (16 to 27-year-olds) in the Canadian Youth Championships and at the All-Ontario Championships. He runs clinics for 18 mid-westerns schools in the Midwest Collegiate Sailing Association (the NCAA of sailing). When he's not sailing, he's studying for a PhD in political science at Washington University in St. Louis.

Lately, he's been racing in 505s, a high performance boat that can reach more than 30 knots per hour in good winds.

"It's scary fast. It's for the seasoned sailor. They're completely an extreme sailing boat," he said.

He's also got his sight set on sailing 49s, a new boat that could be headed for the 2000 Games in Sydney.

Getting to sail in the Olympics is Bookman's ultimate dream and if the 49s "go into the Olympics, I'll really try for it," he promises.

About Life

Dear Ella,

This is probably a silly problem and I'm too embarrassed to discuss it with anyone, so I chose to write anonymously to you.

I lost my mother to cancer a few months ago. The High Holy Days are upon us, and although I am not an observant person, I really feel like I want to attend services this year.

I know this will be the first time I will have to say Yizkor and I am petrified. I realize it is irrational, but I remember as a child being whisked out of the sanctuary when Yizkor began and seeing everyone exit after the prayer in tears. It was pretty scary and I have built this image up in my mind and can't get past it. I don't even know what they do, but it always seemed very powerful to get people out in droves only to have them leave in tears. Any information you could supply would be appreciated.

First Timer

Dear First Timer

I'm very sorry for your loss. I understand your apprehension and can identify somewhat with the description of what you witnessed as a child. Without explanation, the entire scene was rather unnerving. So let's separate fiction from fact.

First of all you do not have to participate in the Yizkor service in the first year of mourning. This will prove to be beneficial to you, as it will give you the time you need to acquaint yourself with the Yizkor service.

Yizkor is recited four times a year. It is directed toward remembering and elevating the soul of the deceased. You can see how natural it would be to have people who are remembering their very closest come to tears.

The sheer melody of the prayers tug at your heart, and when you realize that all Jews everywhere are united at the same time, mourning and remembering as you are, there is a comfort and a closeness that is something only you can feel. I suggest that you do some reading and don't be embarrassed to discuss it with a rabbi. Your problem is far from silly.

I'd like to wish you and all our readers a happy, healthy new year. G'mar Chatimah Tovah.

When he presented his astonishing collection of Incunabula, Hebraica and Judaica to the National Library of Canada in 1981, Jacob M. Lowy said the following: "To speak of the Jewish contribution to world civilization is to examine, in essence, the fate of the Jewish people from the vantage point of world history. Indeed, no other individual history has been involved to a greater extent in...the progressive manifestation of western civilization." In this supplement to our Rosh Hashanah issue, we have asked several writers to explore the remarkable involvement of the Jewish people in the development of western civilization.

The Canadian Jewish news

SECTION B

Editorial

There is so very much to know

The focus of this Rosh Hashanah supplement is the Jewish contribution to the evolution of western civilization over the past 1,000 years.

It is a grand design, and indeed, a grand subject.

Realistically, of course, the following 48 newspaper pages are but the barest introduction to only a small part of the subject.

What is the connection between Rosh Hashanah and an inquiry, of sorts, into the changing of the millennium?

None. The millennium is a Christian calendar marking. It is not a Jewish one. Jews are marking a date – 5760 – that is more than two-thirds between the fifth and sixth millennium on the Jewish calendar.

This supplement is not about the millennium. The changing millennium is merely the excuse, a convenient backdrop. This supplement is about Jews.

Specifically, it is about the astonishing way in which the Jewish people has been involved in shaping the clay that stands today as the remarkable, multi-layered, ever-advancing edifice we call western civilization.

Though the subject is vast, not a great deal has been written about it in a systematic format.

Three works dominate the library shelves: Jewish Contributions to Civilization, An Estimate, Joseph Jacobs, Jewish Publication Society, 1919; The Jewish Contribution to Civilization, Cecil Roth, Macmillan and Co., Ltd., 1938; and The Hebrew Impact on Western Civilization, ed. Dagobert D. Runes, Citadel Press, 1951.

This is where Rashi studied during his adult life in the 11th century–his chapel in Worms, Germany.

Dr. Jacobs, unfortunately, did not live to see his work published. He died in 1916, a proud American Jew who wished merely "to point out the share of the Jews in the world's progress."

Prof. Roth wrote his magnificent work in 1937. Elegantly written and meticulously researched, it provides page after weighty page of eye-opening information. Roth's book is an eloquent, bold, composed response to the hate-filled screeds at the time of the Nazis and their bigoted supporters.

"This work is intended as a contribution towards the settlement of a discussion of long standing, which is now once again to the fore. It is alleged by modern anti-Semites (in order to justify a prejudice which, in these ostensibly tolerant times, they hesitate to base on theological grounds) that the Jew is essentially a middleman, who has produced nothing: that he is an alien excrescence on European life, and that the influence which he has had on western culture, during the pat two thousand years, has been entirely negative, if not deleterious."

Runes wrote his book after the destruction of European Jewry. His work is an anthology of six essays, each written by a different author, not all of them Jews. His introduction is an angry, anguished cri de coeur.

"The Western World has pulled some sordid jokes on the Jew. For almost 2,000 years they stopped him from owing land, and then they accused him of refusing to work it; they stopped him from bearing arms, and then they called him a coward; they kept him from their schools and laughed at his ignorance; they kept him from public office and the right to vote, and then they called him subversive and disloyal; they stopped him from engaging in anything but small trade, and then they referred to him sneeringly as an unmitigated tradesman; and some of the grand lords in the manors of the medieval ages used the Jews to administer their loan business, and then they called them usurers.

"This book will show to those who wish to learn that the Jew is a diligent farmer, an heroic soldier, a loyal servant of his people and an ardent scholar."

His voice virtually lifting off the page, Runes emotionally cries: "Perhaps the world needs to know more about the Jews."

Indeed, that is precisely why we have chosen to focus on the Jewish contribution to western civilization: so that the world, specifically the Jewish world, and more specifically the younger Jewish world, will know more about the Jews.

There is so very much to know. And it is so very important that they know.

We have assembled a strong roster of writers – thinkers, scholars, experts, and enthusiasts – who, metaphorically, only skip their pens across the glass-like surface of their respective subjects.

In a wonderfully poignant and appropriate conclusion to our themed essays, we publish an excerpt from the address delivered by Jacob M. Lowy on the occasion of the opening of the exhibition, some 18 years ago, of the invaluably precious collection of rare Incunabula, Hebraica and Judaica he donated to the National Library of Canada in Ottawa. The Lowy collection is a rare and breathtaking treasure, containing much of the very material referred to in the following essays.

The CJN publicly thanks the authors for their thoughtful and informative essays. Special thanks are extended to Henri Rothschild, president of the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation for contributing an essay and for helping to organize some of the others.

The portraits on the front page of the supplement were drawn by 13-year-old Michael Nisimov.

Throughout the supplement we have attempted to "showcase" material in the Jacob M. Lowy Collection at the National Library of Canada by illustrating a number of essays with reproductions of documents in the collection. Wherever possible, we have identified the document number in the catalogue (JMLC).

Overview of an epoch

'Bloody bookends' mark millennium for Jews

By GIL TROY

As the western world celebrates the millennium, many Jews may refuse to partake in what they deem to be a Christian fiction. Yet we westerners live in a Christian world. All of us in North America tell Christian time. Even the most pious Jews, the most devout Muslims, the most skeptical atheists, date their current cheques with the secular year, marking 1999 years since Jesus' birth.

We can acknowledge the different calendars – and the arbitrary if clever ways humans tell time; we can reject both the doomsday scenarios and the – dare I say it – "millennial" expectations awaiting the secular new year. Still, as a people so rooted in history, we can benefit by contemplating what these past thousand years have meant for us and, alas, done to us.

Christians await their true millennium, a glorious thousand-year epoch promised in Revelations, when "Christ will reign on earth." In fact, many of Jesus' disciples reigned over much of the planet these past 1,000 years, with spotty results. The Crusades that began in 1096 and the Holocaust of 1939 to 1945 encase these past 10 centuries in bloody bookends. In between is a heartbreaking and outrageous catalogue of anti-Semitic expulsions, massacres, murders, decrees, injustices and insults.

Miraculously, Jews have not only survived but have thrived. The Jewish people have withstood their two recurring enemies: murderous hostility from without and an equally threatening indifference from within. It is a remarkable demonstration of historical fortitude – or sheer obstinacy. It is also a tribute to the Jewish people's secret ingredient for success: a unique and fluid combination of religion, nationalism and ethics that made Judaism transportable and durable. Our nationalism kept us rooted in our homeland and committed to each other; our religion and our ethics gave our community spiritual traction, intellectual coherence, and existential meaning.

We must never forget our ghastly past. And yet, we cannot become so embittered that we grant our oppressors posthumous victories: we cannot let them define our Judaism. The great historian Salo Baron repudiated the "lachrymose" – tear-stained – approach to Jewish history. The greater challenge is to avoid a tear-stained Jewish identity, one built on the perverse refusal to let the murderers win rather than on an exuberant embrace of our values, rituals and ideals. A quick triptych through these past 10 centuries suggests there is much to appreciate, much to contemplate.

In an astonishing array of venues, in all four corners of the world, Jews have carved out a particular role in history. With our strong ethical code, with our prickly insistence on keeping our faith, we have remained perennial outsiders – prophets, social critics, scolds, radicals and innovators. Yet, with our chameleon-like ability to blend in, with our keen instinct for survival, we have also been the consummate insiders – advisors, courtiers, administrators, and careerists.

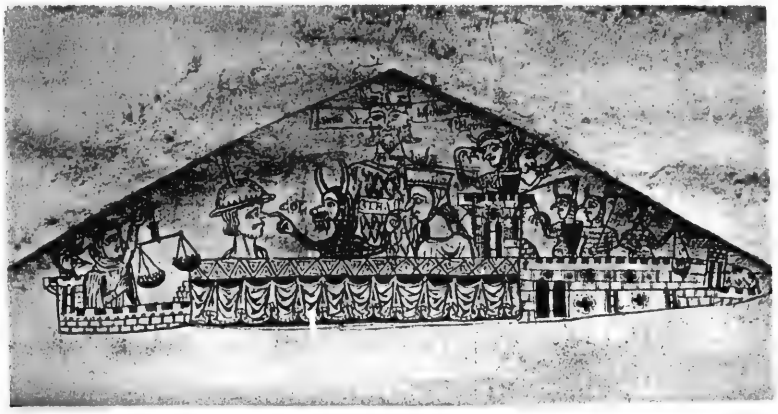
As a people apart, we have not feared to speak truth to power or break the mold. We have been intellectuals in the face of barbarism, modernists in the face of traditionalism, and, so often today, traditional moralists in the face of contemporary nihilism.

At the same time, as veritable nomads, we have often justified ourselves – and saved our skins – by being useful, by being "more Catholic than the Pope," when necessary. These cross-currents have indeed produced many Jewish geniuses over the millennium. We have not produced, however, "a Jewish genius," one "Jewish" way of doing things, one singular approach.

One thousand years ago, the Jews were a people in exile, scattered around the Mediterranean Basin. Most lived under Muslim rule, but the Arab caliphate was crumbling and Christianity's domain was expanding. The spiritual heart of the Jewish people remained Eretz Yisrael, even though Babylonian Jewry had dominated for centuries, Spanish Jewry was thriving, and the communities of Ashkenaz – roughly contemporary France and Germany – were growing.

Banned from many Islamic villages and the elaborate feudal structure of Christian Europe, Jews tended to live in towns. The kehilah, the community, served as the Jews' guild, offering an independent corporate structure that provided an identity. Jews had a whole range of jobs, but were renowned for their network of trading ties, their talents in administering imperial outposts, and their money-lending.



Caricature showing Medieval English Jews, Exchequer Issue Roll, 1233. Public Record Office, London

Despite the pain of exile, despite the palpable longing for Eretz Yisrael, few Jews doubted God, or God's special relationship with the "chosen people." Along with this abiding faith, Jews shared a common sense of national destiny and peoplehood, which their daily rituals and the outside world's hostility reinforced. Yet Jews, with all their insulation, were embedded in the world around them.

The earliest sketch of a medieval Jew – found in the margins of the Forest Roll of Essex England – caricatures a Jew's bushy hair, hooked nose and thick lips. The Jew wears a badge shaped like the two tablets, a reminder that many medieval communities forced Jews to wear some symbol, despite the canard that they all looked alike. At the same time, this reviled Jew, this supposed stranger, wears a medieval cloak like everyone else, testimony to his and his people's adaptability. This sketch, then, illustrates a central theme of Jewish history, the tension between otherness and belonging, as Jews struggled to remain distinct and join the world, just as their neighbors alternately welcomed and rejected them.

In Ashkenaz, the traumatic Crusades and the periodic expulsions fostered a cult of martyrdom, emphasizing the value of dying al kiddush haShem to sanctify God's Name. And the Jews' powerlessness would breed an instinctive obsequiousness and sense of resignation.

But even as the crusading thunder clouds gathered, some rays of light shone with brilliant scholarship, deeds of goodness, innovative ideas. Leading rabbis continued their centuries-old dialogue with the Bible, weaving commentaries, addressing contemporary dilemmas through responsa, and issuing takkanot, ordinances.

Rabbenu Gershom ben Judah (960-1028) "the Light of the Exile," outlawed polygamy and decreed – or is credited with having decreed – that a husband could not divorce his wife unilaterally. These far-reaching decisions harmonized the Jewish way of life with the Christian environment and solidified the monogamous family as the building block of Ashkenazi Jewry.

Ashkenazi culture would become renowned for its piety, its scholarship, its morality, its prosperity. This was a community led by great rabbis and fed by resourceful merchants. Drilling generations of Jews in the back-and-forth casuistic technique of pilpul kept the people of the Book intellectually sharp and uniquely prepared for the mental gymnastics of first, the capitalist era, then, the information age.

Jewish centre shifted toward Christian world

The leading rabbi of the time, and perhaps, of this millennium, the prolific and profound Rabbi Solomon Yitzhaki (1040-1105) lived in Troyes, France. Today, when we comment on Rashi's nearly 1,000-year-old commentaries about our even more ancient Bible, we span the millennia and engage in the critical colloquy so central to Judaism. That, and not programs generated by the federations, is Jewish continuity!

The rise of Ashkenazi Jewry shifted the Jewish centre of gravity toward the Christian world, despite the relatively benign attitude of Islam toward the Jews. As fellow "people of the book," Muslims deemed Jews dhimmis, protected people. The Jews established an elaborate communal hierarchy, with the exilarch the only Jewish authority Muslim rulers recognized. Under Islam, yeshivot had thrived, and many Jews had prospered.

The Jews of Muslim Spain did exceedingly well. They were poets, physicians, traders, military advisers, administrators and courtiers.

The poetry of Rabbi Yehudah Halevi (1074-1141), who sighed, "I am in the west, but my heart is in the east," in Israel, still casts its spell and defines the predicament of many contemporary Jews. Unlike many of his descendants, Halevi actually forsook the riches of the Diaspora for the Holy Land, the symbol of the enduring ties the exiled Jews cultivated with their homeland.

Despite its gradual military decline, the Islamic world still crackled with intellectual energy. The great Jewish philosopher and court physician, Moses ben Maimon (1135-1204), was very much a product of the Islamic world. Maimonides tried to reconcile his venerable faith with the Greek philosophy he and other Islamic scholars studied. Maimonides' rationalist approach provoked great controversy, yet still shapes Jewish thought. Nearly 800 years after his death, his 13 attributes of faith – the Yigdal – and his eight steps of charity continue to color what we believe and how we behave.

Amazingly, such lasting intellectual achievements emerged despite the fragility of medieval life. Lifespans were short. Disease was rampant. The Black Death of 1348-49 decimated Europe and devastated the Jews who were scapegoated for this incomprehensible and uncontrollable epidemic. This turning point in medieval Jewish history would result in mass expulsions from the western lands. Many of the Jews of Ashkenaz would drift eastward toward the Kingdom of Poland and the Duchy of Lithuania, the next great centre of Jewish life.

The Black Death also doomed the Jews of Spain. Life in Christian Spain was less golden than life under the Muslims, though it was still good. But the bubonic plague emboldened the Jews' enemies, who spread lies about Jews poisoning the wells (in addition to desecrating the Host and harvesting the blood of young Christians).

This upheaval eventually spawned the infamous Inquisition and expulsion from Spain in 1492. Alas, as with the Jews of Poland in our own century, the tragic final chapter would eclipse good and important memories of centuries of creativity, prosperity, even power.

Some of the Jews fleeing the Inquisition sailed for the New World – presaging the rise of another great Jewish centre. But most of the Sephardim, the Spanish Jews, ended up living in the expanding Ottoman Empire, which in 1517 would conquer Eretz Yisrael. That Jews in mid-millennium found refuge in the relatively "backward" east from the supposedly more civilized west illustrates that, tragically, progress has not always been good for the Jews.

Painting broad, even gross, brush strokes of major migrations, large communities, leading figures, neglects the fact that life was lived on a small scale, in intimate settings. Most people rarely ventured more than five miles from their birthplaces in their entire lives. And in this pre-nationalist era, Jews defined themselves by their home towns more than by their regions or "countries."

To do real justice to Jewish life then (as now) we need to etch fine portraits of anonymous Jews who regularly set the Shabbat table, lit candles, prayed in shul, and went to the market, worked for a living, raised a family. This was the period in which the Jewish people not only kept the Shabbat but the Shabbat kept the Jewish people, emphasizing the interconnection between what we would now artificially distinguish as Judaism's religious and nationalist components. Most Jews lived Jewish lives. They, like us, yearned for "boredom," meaning safety, stability, regularity.

The Shulchan Aruch offers a lasting public symbol of these private acts of Jewish living. Hebrew for the "set table," this compilation of Sephardi customs reflects the comprehensiveness and timelessness of the Halachah, Jewish law. Compiled in 1555 by

Caro's Shulchan Aruch became the standard text

Joseph Caro (1488-1575), who was born in the Balkans but lived in the holy city of Safed, the book remains the authoritative source for Jewish ritual practice. Rabbi Moses Isserles, the chief rabbi of Krakow, Poland, catalogued the contrasts between Ashkenazi and Sephardi ritual using Caro's work as his standard.

The resulting mappah or tablecloth, spread over the table of the Shulchan Aruch, acknowledged Caro's primacy, and was incorporated into subsequent editions for Ashkenazim.

Caro's adopted home of Safed flourished under Ottoman rule. It became a centre for the Jewish textile trade and for the mystical counterattack against Maimonidean rationalism. Kabbalists, mystics like Rabbi Isaac Luria (1534-1572), contemplated the mysteries of creation, of exile, of redemption, while emphasizing good deeds, asceticism and intensive prayer.

For Ha'Ari and his mystics, Shabbat was the weekly attempt to set the world right. Bedecked in white, they would beckon the Sabbath Queen amid the glorious hills of Galilee, singing "Come my beloved," Lecha Dodi, "Come O Bride," Bo'ee Kalah.

The Kabbalists grappled with the mystery of Jewish suffering, while seeking what moderns might call an authentic Judaism. Whatever successes Jews enjoyed, whatever autonomy their individual kehilot, communities, secured, whatever influence shtadlanim or intercessors held, all could vanish in a flash, as a result of forces beyond the Jews' control. When Catholicism underwent its own internal crisis during the Catholic counter-reformation of the 16th century, the Jews of Venice ended up in a ghetto, a new and particularly ugly invention.

One hundred and thirty years later, in 1648, when Bogdan Khmelnitski led a populist Cossack revolt against Polish nobles in the Ukraine, he massacred the local Jews. Jews wanted answers, which is why some turned to Kabbalah; they yearned for salvation, which is why some turned to false messiahs, most notably Shabbetai Zevi (1626-1676), who dazzled the Jewish masses until he betrayed them by converting to Islam in 1666.

The twin shocks of Khmelnitski and Sabbateanism shattered the Polish Lithuanian community. This tranquil community of scholars and merchants enjoyed great autonomy. The local governing structures of the kehilah, the community, institutionalized rabbinic authority, collected taxes, enforced order, and maintained schools, mikvot, yeshivot and synagogues. Sing-song of yeshiva learning characterized communities idarity), the communities looked out for the widowed, the orphaned, the sick and the poor.

During long stretches, throughout many lifetimes, the Jews of Poland and Lithuania led lives governed more by Halachah than by secular law, lives surrounded by fellow Jews and often characterized by minimal contact with the outside world, depending on one's livelihood.

These communities buzzed with the characteristic sing-song of yeshiva learning but began to grow intellectually stale. As the Renaissance, then the early Enlightenment, supplanted the Dark Ages, new ideas swirled throughout Europe. Protestantism nurtured the seeds of individualism, humanism and rationalism – and improved the Jews' lot in the Netherlands and England. As modern thought became centred on man not God, Jews would enjoy more freedom – and more pressure to jettison their own God-based way of life.

One of the first Jews to embrace this intellectual and political revolution was Baruch Spinoza (1632-1677), a Sephardi exile living in Amsterdam. In rejecting Jewish society – and being rejected by it – this creative philosopher did not adopt another religion; he became what so many of his descendants would try to become, a man of the world.

The Ba'al Shem Tov from Heritage, Civilization and the Jews

By the 18th century, with the seductions of modernity just beginning to beckon, with the insulated Jewish communities of eastern Europe withering intellectually and spiritually, a great civil war of words not swords ensued. A charismatic folk preacher, Israel ben Eliezer of Miedzyborz (1700-1760) sought to purge Judaism of its elitism, its casuistry, its stiffness. This Master of the Good Name, the Baal Shem Tov, captured the imagination of the Jewish masses with a revivalist chassidic movement that was ecstatic, populist, often deliciously primitive.

Opposing the Chassidim were the Mitnagdim, led by the brilliant Elijah of Vilna, the Vilna Gaon (1720-1797), a rationalist polymath who revitalized talmudic study, making it less pedantic and more informed by secular sciences and logic.

For all the bitterness between the Chassidim and the Mitnagdim, both camps remained rooted in tradition. Yet more and more Jews could flourish in the outside world, as the capitalist revolution began to judge people more by their economic skills than by their religious beliefs.

The rise of the Rothschilds in the 1760s began a financial and philanthropic dynasty that would symbolize to friend and foe alike, the Jewish role in building the new economic order.

Many of the Jews who prospered in this new world wanted to enlighten their benighted people. Fortunately, the first great Jewish figure of the Enlightenment, Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1786) shared that passion for renewal without the condescension. In Hebrew, the word for Enlightenment is Haskalah, the intellectual epoch, which emphasizes thought not light.

Many Jews did assimilate

Hailed by his own people as the third great Moses, linked in a chain of genius with Maimonides and Moshe Rabbeinu, the parlor sophisticates of Berlin society toasted him as the "Jewish Socrates." A Maskil and an Orthodox Jew, Mendelssohn recognized the great intellectual promise of the Enlightenment. He was, however, less cognizant of the secular temptations that could bewitch his people and his own family. Mendelssohn's characteristically modern balancing act was idiosyncratic and not enduring. Two generations later, his grandson Felix, the Romantic composer, was raised as a Christian.

If Enlightenment presaged an intellectual and spiritual renaissance, emancipation promised political and social inclusion. Throughout western Europe, the newfound cult of the rights of man, the cries of liberty, equality and fraternity, invited Jews to join the mainstream.

But this invitation was a double-edged sword. As Jews learned from Napoleon's Sanhedrin of 1807, and throughout the 19th century, most enlightened Europeans expected that once Jews were emancipated from their ghettos, they would free themselves from their backward faith.

Moses Mendelssohn

While many Jews did assimilate – as they had been doing for centuries – most Jewish leaders concentrated on reforming Judaism not abandoning it. The ensuing theological crisis created the reigning trinity of contemporary Jewry: the Reform, Orthodox and Conservative movements.

All Jews today, from the most freethinking clean-shaven secularist to the most fundamentalist payes-wearing haredi, are children of the Enlightenment, balancing modernity and tradition. Most of us have embraced modernity and worship change; those who do not have been revolutionized by the fight against change, despite themselves.

Now, unlike in medieval times, the west was more hospitable to Jews than the east, the Christian world friendlier than the Muslim world – although Sephardi Jews who settled in North Africa and the Middle East were tolerated. Some western Jews now had unprecedented opportunities to shape the secular world around them.

Some, like Benjamin Disraeli of England (1804-1881) and Leon Blum of France (1872-1950) would even become prime ministers of their native lands. Others, like the secular prophets Karl Marx (1818-83), Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), and Albert Einstein (1879-1955) would transform modern politics, science and thought. Judaism delicately balanced the sanctity of the individual and of the community. In breaking out of the traditional structures, modern Jews would help father contradictory ideologies of intense individualism and blind communalism.

Unfortunately, the forces of liberalism, rationalism, individualism and nationalism also unleashed a new, virulent anti-Semitism. With a peculiar resistance to any kind of logic, the new anti-Semite condemned the cosmopolitan Jews' enthusiastic embrace of modernity, and the traditional Jews' stiff-necked insistence on remaining distinct; the Jews' rapacious Rothschild capitalism and the Jews' radical Marxist socialism. This ugly movement, mixing elite abstractions with populist resentments, triggered pogroms in the east, and ultimately resulted in the west's signal contribution to the history of savagery, the German-made Holocaust.

The Jews' profound disappointment that enlightened Europe had not freed itself from its irrational Jew hatred, triggered the Zionist movement.

Guided by the reluctant visionary Theodor Herzl (1860-1904), Zionism revitalized the ancient messianic yearning for a return home from exile with a modern injection of liberal democratic nationalism. The result was a powerful but contradictory national liberation movement that established a European-oriented old-new land in the Middle East. The movement succeeded because it combined the legitimacy and intensity of a 4,000-year-old claim with the relevance and passion of a modern revolution.

Ironically, the Zionist backlash against European anti-Semitism triggered an Arab backlash that displaced Sephardi Jewry. In barely a decade, from Yemen to Syria, from Iran to Morocco, Jews expelled after hundreds of years of peaceful and prosperous living in Arab and North African countries found a home in Israel.

The Judaism these Sephardim practised for centuries was often more vital and less arid than the Ashkenazi variety, more focused on actions than abstractions.

The Zionism these refugees brought was less intellectual and more instinctive, less modern and more traditional. Half a century later, Israel is still struggling to synthesize the competing visions and fully integrate the different, occasionally quarrelsome yet ultimately deeply united communities.

The founding of Israel ends this millennium on a miraculous note. The historical wrong of two millennia ago – our expulsion from our homeland – has finally been righted. Modern Israel is an exciting, flourishing, Jewish democracy, the culmination of 4,000 years of civilization. Yet the majority of Jews today have not returned home. Even as Israel shines as the emotional and spiritual focal point of world Jewry, North America offers a competing vision.

If Israel represents the failure of enlightened Europe to accommodate the Jew, North America symbolizes the Enlightenment dream come true. North American Jewry has produced a disproportionate share of all-American heroes, great jurists like Louis Brandeis, munificent entrepreneurs like Samuel Bronfman and influential activists like Betty Friedan.

Jews making secular culture more creative

What would popular culture be without such Jewish creations as Superman, CBS, MGM and Seinfeld? What would the music scene be without Irving Berlin's White Christmas and America the Beautiful, Leonard Bernstein's West Side Story, Bob Dylan's Blowin' in the Wind? Maybe better, maybe worse, but certainly different.

As with the Golden Age of Muslim Spain, Jews during this Golden Age in enlightened North America enjoyed a creative symbiosis with their neighbors.

By contrast, when Jews enjoyed a golden age in Catholic countries, in Ashkenaz, in Poland, in Lithuania, a separation from their neighbors did the trick.

Under Islam in its heyday, both Jews and Muslims were rooted in a legal and national religious framework and shared a fascination with the outside world. Together, they developed secular arts such as philosophy and poetry, which in turn made Judaism more rationalist and humanist.

Similarly, in North America, Jews have built on the widespread commitment to liberty and equality, at once making the secular culture more creative, more critical, more just, and Judaism more flexible, more liberal, more pluralistic – for better and worse.

Alas, the power to fulfil this Enlightenment dream threatens to become an American Jewish nightmare. Most of us have shifted our orientation and are more modern than traditional, more secular than Jewish. It is telling that the influential Jews of centuries ago highlighted here shaped our Judaism, while most of the contemporary Jews mentioned shaped our secular surroundings.

The fleshpots of North America lure Jews into surrendering voluntarily what our ancestors risked death to keep: our heritage. One of the great gifts of North America is the opportunity to acquire amnesia, to forget who your people are and join the spoiled masses mindlessly devouring the latest consumer goods and entertainment packages.

This, then, will be the challenge of the next millennium – to maintain this remarkable, venerable, golden chain of ours by choice and not by fiat. We have survived millennia of massacres and mockery by being extraordinarily adaptable and unbelievably unyielding. Our ties to Eretz Yisrael, our faith in God, our sense of solidarity and our oversupply of daily, monthly, yearly rituals kept our Judaism alive. At the same time, as people of the Book, with a genius for synthesis, we did not restrict ourselves to our own Tanach and Talmud. We zestfully sifted, tasted, confronted, co-opted, revised and reinterpreted the central ideas of each epoch we lived in, each region we occupied. We are at once an eternal people and a historical people, protecting certain ideas, concepts, rituals from change, while also growing, developing, evolving with the natural flow of time.

Albert Einstein

As Jews, we use our past to bring meaning to the present. When we study Torah, we hark back to Sinai; when we usher in the Shabbat with Lecha Dodi, we return to Safed; when we shout, "We are one" or save Ethiopian Jews, we reject the Holocaust; when we support the State of Israel, we acknowledge that the Land of Israel has kept and still keeps Jews united.

Every day, as lawyers, doctors, professors and programmers, we deploy and benefit from the insight of Rashi, the rationalism of Maimonides, the meticulousness of Caro, the creativity of Einstein. As Jews we can take pride in the contributions our people have made to western civilization over the last thousand years; as moderns we can appreciate the impact western life has had on us at the same time.

La présence juive dans la littérature est si immense, si complexe, si diverse qu'il importe, d'entrée de jeu, de procéder à annoncer les limites de cet article.

Pour un Juif qui pratique le Livre, tout est dit dans la Bible et tout écrit postérieur ne peut qu'en être le commentaire ou l'éloge. Or, au cours de leur histoire, les Juifs ont dû faire face à une adversité quand ce n'était pas à une entreprise de haine et de destruction. Aussi, l'écrivain juif, et je m'en tiendrais au siècle qui se termine, a dû tenir compte de plusieurs éléments Parmi les grandes figures qui ont bouleversé la littérature occidentale du vingtième siècle, les Juifs occupent une place éminente. Je songe d'abord à Franz Kafka, puis à Marcel Proust qui, tout en n'étant que de mère juive, a amplement évoqué dans "À la recherche du temps perdu" le milieu juif parisien du début du siècle. Le troisième nom qui me vient à l'esprit est celui de Sigmund Freud. Il est certes reconnu comme le fondateur de la psychanalyse et s'est présenté lui-même comme savant. Cependant, ses écrits sur les civilisations, sur la culture et surtout son livre Moïse et le monothéisme le classent parmi les grands écrivains et penseurs du siècle.

Il y eut des écrivains qui, tout en étant d'origine juive, n'ont point abordé dans leurs écrits des thèmes qui touchent les Juifs ou le judaïsme. En France, ce fut, par exemple, le cas de Tristan Bernard et d'André Maurois.

Parmi les écrivains qui se sont présentés en tant que Juifs et qui ont évoqué le monde juif dans leurs oeuvres, je voudrais citer deux Séfarades: Elias Canetti (Prix Nobel de littérature) et Albert Cohen. Tous deux, chacun à sa manière, ont mis en lumière l'état des choses sans refuser implicitement de proposer une défense et une illustration de la vie juive dans notre siècle. Face à un monde constamment menacé par la barbarie, ils persistaient à affirmer une volonté de vivre. En dépit de la montée des monstres, le judaïsme qu'ils évoquaient refusait de mourir et fournissait des lueurs d'espoir à un monde à la dérive.

La présence juive s'est affirmée dans une diversité de pays et de langues. Mentionnons d'abord les langues où le judaïsme se trouve d'emblée chez lui: le yiddish et l'hébreu. De Shalom Aleikeim à Isaac Bachevis Singer, sans oublier les écrivains de Montréal, les J.A. Segal, Melekh Ravitch et Rachel Korn, tout au long du siècle, ces écrivains yiddish ont révélé aux autres Juifs la vie de leurs sociétés tout en faisant découvrir au monde les figures, les visages qui, dans leur noblesse ou leur misère, expriment un particularisme qui atteint l'universel. Cette littérature appartient malheureusement désormais à l'histoire car la Shoah a emporté cette civilisation et a fait taire la grande majorité des locuteurs de cette langue.

Bien avant la naissance de l'État d'Israël, des écrivains avaient renoué des liens avec la langue de la Bible. Ben Yéhouda l'a dotée d'une grammaire moderne qui lui ouvrait les portes du siècle tout en conservant sa splendeur intemporelle. Bialik, Agnon entre autres furent les bâtisseurs de l'État bien avant sa naissance. Au cours des dernières cinquante années, nous avons assisté à l'éclosion puis à l'épanouissement d'une littérature israélienne qui replace le judaïsme au coeur du quotidien mais aussi au centre des conflits de notre temps.

Dans son implication naturelle dans le judaïsme, la littérature israélienne décrit la vie d'un peuple aux prises avec la modernité, la technologie, un peuple qui subit l'hostilité de ses voisins. Des poètes comme Haïm Gouri, Yéhouda Amichai, des romanciers comme David Shahar, A.B. Yéhochoua, Amos Oz, David Grossmann sont des voix qui, à travers un pays, disent l'humanité.

Le rêve d'une égalité, d'une justice universelle, proposées par Karl Marx, un petit fils de rabbin converti au christianisme, a inspiré nombre d'écrivains juifs de divers pays: Ernst Toller en Allemagne, Jean-Richard Bloch en France, Howard Fast aux États-Unis, sans parler de ceux de l'URSS, Isaac Babel, Ilya Ehrenbourg, Vassily Grossmann, ainsi que les victimes du stalinisme, Ossip Mandelstam, et de nombreux écrivains yiddish.

En France, alors que lors de l'affaire Dreyfus, l'antisémitisme faisait rage, Bernard Lazare et André Spire ont fait entendre la voix des Juifs. Ils furent suivi par les antifascistes Julien Benda et Emmanuel Berl et par ceux qui redécouvraient les richesses de leur héritage, Edmond Fleg, Claude Vigée, et surtout Emmanuel Lévinas qui allait jouer un rôle essentiel dans le renouveau de la pensée juive en France et dans le monde.

Même quand ils expriment leur judaïsme, les écrivains épousent le plus souvent les traditions linguistiques et culturelles de leurs pays. Ainsi, avant sa décadence et sa destruction par les nazis, la culture de l'Europe centrale, ayant comme centre Vienne, avait comme têtes d'affiche des Juifs comme Karl Kraus et Hermann Bloch.

En Grande-Bretagne, avant de devenir le premier ministre de la Reine Victoria, Benjamin Disraéli qui a poussé son intégration à l'Empire jusqu'au point de changer de religion, fut d'abord un écrivain qui ne reniait pas son origine séfarade. La diversité interne du Royaume Uni a permis à des écrivains aussi différents que le sioniste Israël Zangwill, le philosophe Isaiah Berlin et plus tard, les dramaturges Arnold Wesker et Harold Pinter de faire entendre des voix particulières qui s'inséraient dans l'ensemble. Ainsi, même Pinter ne fait pas mention dans ses pièces de son origine juive, ses descriptions de hiérarchies sociales, surtout en ce qui a trait aux niveaux de langue, indiquent une perception qui est, comme dans le cas de nombreux écrivains juifs, un point de rencontre entre une tradition particulière et la culture du pays.

C'est aux États-Unis qu'un tel point de rencontre fut si riche qu'on est tenté de le qualifier comme exemplaire. Au dix-neuvième siècle déjà la poétesse Emma Lazarus a chanté l'accueil de l'Amérique aux pauvres, aux assoiffés de liberté. Il a fallu attendre trois générations pour que ce qu'on a appelé l'école juive de New York atteigne un sommet de la littérature américaine et universelle. Son chef de file, Saul Bellow est un natif de Lachine au Québec. L'un de ses membres, Bernard Malamud, a dit, sans vantardise, que, d'après lui, tout Américain est Juif car le judaïsme est un humanisme qui imprègne l'Occident. Philip Roth, qui est indiscutablement l'un des grands romanciers contemporains, a exposé les difficultés auxquelles l'écrivain juif est confronté. Toute critique qu'il adresse à sa communauté est considérée, par une minorité vilipendée par les antisémites, comme une menace, de l'eau versée au moulin de l'ennemi. La liste des écrivains juifs américains est longue et prestigieuse: Lionel Trilling, Leslie Fiedler, Susan Sontag, Norman Mailer, Cynthia Ozick, liste qui se poursuit avec Jerome Charyn et Paul Auster.

L'importance numérique de la communauté juive américaine joue un rôle dans la présence des Juifs dans la littérature ainsi que dans les divers domaines intellectuels, mais aussi la liberté offerte par ce pays à tous les immigrants d'appartenir au pays sans nier leurs origines explique leur présence.

Au Canada, les écrivains juifs ont connu une même liberté, une semblable ouverture. On peut dire qu'ils n'ont pas failli à leur rôle et ont donné à la culture du pays une dimension supplémentaire. Imprégné de la lecture de la Bible et des lettres yiddish, A.M. Klein était aussi un grand admirateur de James Joyce. Son oeuvre poétique, son roman "Le deuxième rouleau" sont des textes importants de la littérature canadienne. Montréalais, Klein fut l'un des premiers à souhaiter puis à tenter de concevoir, sur le plan littéraire, un Canada qui comprendrait, dans l'égalité, toutes ses dimensions, toutes ses parties, toutes ses cultures et d'abord le Québec francophone, l'héritage britannique et le judaïsme.

Montréal fut un terreau juif de taille. En plus des écrivains yiddish, les poètes Irving Layton, Leonard Cohen, le romancier Mordecai Richler sont des écrivains juifs et canadiens de première importance. Les écrivains juifs furent présents ailleurs au Canada: Adele Wiseman, Miriam Waddington originaires du Manitoba, Eli Mandel, natif d'Erivan, Saskatchewan et longtemps professeur à Toronto.

Jusqu'à récemment, les écrivains juifs du Canada étaient exclusivement de langues yiddish et anglaise mais désormais les portes du français s'ouvrent et les Juifs commencent à affirmer leur présence dans cette langue aussi.

Le philosophe Adorno a écrit qu'après Auschwitz il n'est plus possible d'écrire. La Shoah a emporté la majorité des Juifs européens. On continue certes à écrire mais ce n'est plus de la même manière. Une littérature d'outre-tombe existe et dit en même temps l'impossibilité d'écrire et la nécessité de célébrer la mémoire des disparus. De la part des survivants, rappeler l'assassinat des innocents est aussi une façon de leur rendre justice. Les poèmes de Paul Celan, les textes de Primo Lévi, d'Élie Wiesel, d'Anna Langfus, d'André Schwarz-Bart disent à la fois la tragédie et la mémoire. C'est une littérature qui rejoint la prière aux morts qui, dans le judaïsme, est une prière aux vivants.

La mémoire séfarade existe aussi. Car, sans être massacrés, les Juifs du Moyen-Orient et d'Afrique du Nord furent déplacés, chassés, acculés au départ. Leur mémoire est douloureuse même si le rappel de l'origine recèle le sentiment de perte et s'imprègne de nostalgie. Qu'ils écrivent en français comme Albert Memmi ou en hébreu comme Sami Mikhaël, ils rappellent la disparition de sociétés, de cultures qui, heureusement, se poursuivent ailleurs, en Israël, en France, au Canada en se transformant, en empruntant d'autres avenues.

Pour les écrivains juifs, le siècle qui se termine fut le plus tragique, le plus mouvementé mais aussi le plus riche. En dépit de l'appel des barbares à leur mort, de la volonté des totalitarismes de les détruire, les voix des écrivains juifs persistent et ils ne furent jamais aussi nombreux pour dire le judaïsme, qui est une manière d'exprimer l'humanisme.

Jews and literature

An immense presence

By NAÏM KATTAN

The Jewish presence in literature is so immense, so complex, so diverse, that it is important, from the outset, to state the limits of this article.

For a Jew who follows the Bible, everything has been said in that Book, and subsequent writing can only be a commentary on it or praise it.

Throughout their history, Jews have had to face adversity, if not outright hatred or destruction. Thus, the Jewish writer in this century has had to take several things into consideration.

Jewish writers are among the distinguished figures who totally changed 20th-century western literature. I think first of Franz Kafka; then of Marcel Proust, whose mother was Jewish and who evoked in A la recherche du temps perdu the Jewish milieu of Paris at the beginning of the century.

The third name that comes to mind is Sigmund Freud, who is recognized as the father of psychoanalysis and said of himself that he was a scientist. However, his writing on civilizations, on culture, and especially his book, Moses and Monotheism, classify him among the great writers and thinkers of the century.

Some writers, although they were of Jewish origin, did not, in their writing, touch on Jewish themes. This was the case in France, for example, with Tristan Bernard and André Maurois.

Among the writers who did present themselves as Jews and who evoked the Jewish world in their works, I would like to name two Sephardim: Elias Canetti, who won the Nobel Prize for literature, and Albert Cohen. Both men, each in his own way, shed light on the modern world, while providing an illustration of Jewish life in our century. Faced with a world constantly threatened by barbarism, they persisted in affirming a will to live. Despite the rise of monsters, the Judaism they evoked refused to die, and provided glimmers of hope in a world adrift.

The Jewish presence has asserted itself in many different countries and languages. First, there are the languages that are intrinsically part of Judaism: Yiddish and Hebrew. Throughout the century, from Shalom Aleichem to Isaac Bashevis Singer, and including Montreal writers J.A. Segal, Melech Ravitch and Rachel Korn, Yiddish writers have shown other Jews what life was like in their own communities. At the same time, they introduced to the world characters who, in their nobility or their misfortune, express a universal sense of identity.

This literature, unfortunately, now belongs to history, for the Shoah carried off that civilization and silenced the vast majority of speakers of that language.

Well before the birth of the State of Israel, writers had again begun to use the language of the Bible. Eliezer ben Yehudah endowed it with a modern grammar that made it more accessible to the modern world while still maintaining its timeless splendor. Chaim Nachman Bialik and Samuel J. Agnon, among others, were the builders of the state, well before its birth.

In the last 50 years, we have witnessed the birth and the blossoming of an Israeli literature that places Judaism at the heart of everyday life, and at the same time, at the core of the conflicts of our time.

In its natural involvement with Judaism, Israeli literature describes the life of a people dealing with modernity and technology, a people subjected to the hostility of its neighbors. Poets such as Chaim Gouri, Yehuda Amichai, and novelists such as David Shahar, A.B. Yehoshua, Amos Oz and David Grossman are voices that speak of humanity.

The dream of equality and universal justice proposed by Karl Marx, a convert to Christianity and grandson of a rabbi, inspired several Jewish writers from various countries: Ernst Toller in Germany, Jean-Richard Bloch in France and Howard Fast in the United States, as well as those from the former Soviet Union, Isaac Babel, Ilya Ehrenburg, Vassily Grossmann, and the victims of Stalinism, Ossip

Writers espoused their own linguistic, cultural traditions

Mandelstam, and several Yiddish writers.

In France, at the time of the Dreyfus affair, when anti-Semitism was raging, Bernard Lazare and André Spire made sure the Jewish voice was heard. They were followed by anti-fascists Julien Benda and Emmanuel Berl, and by writers who were rediscovering the richness of their heritage – Edmond Fleg, Claude Vigée, and most notably, Emmanuel Lévinas, who was to play an essential role in the revival of Jewish thought in France and in the world.

Even when they were expressing their Judaism, writers generally espoused the linguistic and cultural traditions of their own countries. Thus, before its decline and destruction by the Nazis, the culture of central Europe, with Vienna as its centre, had as leaders Jews such as Karl Kraus and Hermann Bloch.

In Great Britain, Queen Victoria's prime minister, Benjamin Disraeli, who was assimilated to the point of changing his religion, was primarily a writer who did not deny his Sephardi origin. The diversity within the United Kingdom enabled writers as different as Zionist Israel Zangwill, philosopher Isaiah Berlin and later, dramatists Arnold Wesker and Harold Pinter to be heard as distinctive voices that became part of the whole. Although Pinter does not mention his Jewish origins in his plays, his descriptions of social hierarchies, especially with regard to levels of language, indicate a perception that is – as is the case with a number of Jewish writers – a meeting point between a specific tradition and the culture of the country.

In the United States, this kind of meeting point was so rich that one is tempted to use it as exemplary. In the 19th century, Emma Lazarus was already writing about the welcome America gives to the tired, the poor, the "huddled masses yearning to be free."

It took three generations for what has been called the Jewish school of New York to reach the summit of American and universal literature. Its leader, Saul Bellow, is a native of Lachine, Que. One of its members, Bernard Malamud, has said that, according to him, every

Primo Levi

American is Jewish because Judaism s a humanism that permeates the west.

Philip Roth, who is indisputably one of the great contemporary novelists, has described the difficulties faced by the Jewish writer.

The list of Jewish American writers is long and distinguished: Lionel Trilling, Leslie Fiedler, Susan Sontag, Norman Mailer, Cynthia Ozick, as well as Jerome Charyn and Paul Auster.

The sheer size of the American Jewish community plays a role in the presence of Jews in literature, as in many intellectual fields, but another factor is the freedom that the United States gives all its immigrants.

In Canada, Jewish writers have known the same freedom, a similar openness. It can be said that they succeeded in giving the culture of the country an additional dimension. Steeped in the Bible and Yiddish writing, A.M. Klein was also a great admirer of James Joyce. His poetry and his novel, The Second Scroll, are important works of Canadian literature. A Montrealer, Klein was one of the first to wish for and then to try to conceive of a body of literature in Canada that would be made up equally of all its dimensions, all its cultures, beginning with francophone Quebec, British heritage and Judaism.

Montreal was a major Jewish centre. In addition to the Yiddish writers, Montreal produced poets Irving Layton and Leonard Cohen, and novelist Mordecai Richler, who are Canadian Jewish writers of primary significance.

Jewish writers have also come from other parts of Canada: Adele Wiseman and Miriam Waddington from Manitoba; Eli Mandel from Erivan, Sask., a longtime protessor in Toronto.

Until recently, Jewish writers in Canada were exclusively Yiddish and English speaking, but now French is also beginning to make its voice heard.

Philosopher Theodor Adorno wrote that after Auschwitz, it is no longer possible to write. The Shoah took the majority of European Jews. We certainly continue to write, but no longer in the same way. There is a literature from the other side of the grave, which speaks at the same time, of the impossibility of writing and the necessity of celebrating the memory of those who have died. For survivors, recalling the assassination of the innocents is also a way to do them justice.

The poems of Paul Celan and the texts of Primo Levi, Elie Wiesel, Anna Langfus and Andre Schwarz-Bart speak at the same time of tragedy and memory. It is a literature that serves as a prayer for the dead, which, in Judaism, is a prayer for the living.

There is also Sephardi memory, for, without being massacred, the Jews of the Middle East and North Africa were displaced, chased, driven away, at the outset. Their memory is painful, even if the recollection of their origin conceals their feeling of loss and is filled with nostalgia. Whether they write in French like Albert Memmi, or in Hebrew like Sami Mikhaël, they recall the disappearance of societies and cultures which fortunately are still to be found elsewhere – in Israel, in France, in Canada – where they are being transformed by borrowing from other avenues.

For Jewish writers, the century that is ending has been the most tragic, the most momentous, but also the richest. Despite the barbarous calls for their death, despite the will of totalitarian states to destroy them, the voices of Jewish writers persist, and there have never been so many to speak of Judaism, which is a way of expressing humanism.

Novelist and essayist Naïm Kattan is a literary critic with Le Devoir and one of the foremost francophone literary and intellectual figures scene in Quebec and Canada.

Jews and art

Inspired by geography, culture

By LEAH GOLDBERG and ELIZHEVA HURVICH

The question of what constitutes Jewish art has puzzled scholars for years. "The conception of Jewish Art may appear to some a contradiction in terms," wrote Cecil Roth in his Introduction to Jewish Art: An Illustrated History (1961).

Is there such a thing as Jewish art? Is it the depiction of Jewish subjects? Must there be particular Jewish iconography or symbolism to qualify the art as Jewish? Is it the work of Jewish artists?

Jewish involvement in the visual arts has always been inspired and influenced by the geographical and cultural milieu in which the artist resided. However, it was only in the 19th century that Jews began to emerge as important contributors and innovators in the general development of western art.

A look at the place of art in Judaism must begin with an examination of the second commandment given to the people of Israel at Mount Sinai:

"Thou shalt not make for thyself any carved idol, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth." (Exodus 20:4)

This verse is often regarded as problematic. There are two ways to understand this commandment. It can be interpreted as either a prohibition against creating idols for worship or as a prohibition against representative art in general. This verse has often been used to explain why Jews do not have a long tradition of art production.

In fact, this interpretation of the second commandment is not consistent with the historical reality. Indeed, there is no evidence of a comprehensive ban on the production of art by Jews. Throughout the ages, Jews have been active, to some degree, in the creative arts.

Mezuzot, Torah curtains (parochet), kiddush cups and spice boxes are just a few examples of Jewish art objects used to adorn and enhance Jewish ritual practice. We call these objects, which are employed in the home and in houses of worship, Judaica. Judaica has been produced continuously for centuries by communities around the world and is easily recognizable as Jewish art.

Another well-known form of Jewish art is manuscripts, including Passover Haggadot, ketubot (marriage contracts), and scrolls of Esther. These works are frequently elaborate, with decorative lettering, illustrations or illuminations. All of the above examples of Judaica were produced both for utilitarian purposes and for the sake of hiddur mitzvah.

Hiddur mitzvah involves the design, creation and use of beautiful and artistic objects in the active observance of God's commandments. Two biblical sources that discuss hiddur mitzvah include Moses' song in Exodus 15:2 and Psalm 29:2. It is also discussed in the Talmud in Shabbat 133b and Sukkah 11b which explain that one should use a beautiful sukkah, etrog, lulav, shofar and tallit; and a Torah scroll written with fine ink, with a good pen, by a skilled scribe, and bound in fine silks. The effort to create attractive ceremonial objects for use in the observance of the commandments has inspired artists throughout the ages.

Judaica is an esthetic expression of material culture, the material evidence of our physical circumstances, or the "stuff" of everyday Jewish life. Just as archeologists reconstruct and explore the lifestyles, habits and culture of peoples through the material goods found in excavations, art historians can examine the diversity of Jewish material culture by examining the objects found in various Jewish communities.

But material culture is not restricted to Judaica. It also encompasses the broader study of Jewish identity and ethnography. It includes, but is not limited to, Jewish newspapers, recipe books, bar mitzvah invitations, wedding dresses and ephemera (paper tickets, invitations, programs and playbills) from Jewish cultural events.

While the Jews have a rich tradition of Judaica and material culture, the field of Jewish fine art is arguably the least definitive and the most difficult to discern. To do so, one must explore the historical development of the Jewish contribution to the fine arts.

Moritz Oppenheim (1800-1882), is generally regarded as the first modern Jewish artist. His painting, Return of the Jewish Volunteer from the Wars of Liberation to His Family Still Living According to the Old Customs, (1833-34), is a historical genre painting.

Like many of the paintings produced in this time, Oppenheim's work shows a detailed view into a private home and the use of the popular theme of the army volunteer. Oppenheim elaborates on the prevalent style among his contemporaries, but infuses conspicuously Jewish subject matter. The hanging Sabbath lamp (the Judenstern), the Kiddush cup, boys wearing kippot and the father's open prayer book identify this scene as a Jewish home. The sense of pride in Jewish participation in the military efforts of their country of residence is seen in the father's face, as he looks at his son's iron cross.

Jews began to revive ideal of Jewish nationhood

The fusion of secular and Jewish iconography in this painting attests to the artist's conviction that Jews were capable of dual allegiance. Accusations surrounding "dual loyalties" had been used historically by authorities to prevent Jews from attaining full legal and civil rights.

"Oppenheim's portraits mirror the choices open to the Jews in Germany during this period, and show his involvement with those who made these choices," writes art historian Gabrielle Sed-Rajna in her comprehensive work, Jewish Art, published in 1997.

In fact, Oppenheim's work also appealed to a broader audience. According to Sed-Rajna, "Christians were curious about the mores and religion of those exotic Jews who were occupying an increasingly important role in German public life." Thus, Oppenheim's art aptly captured the mood of the political and ideological movements, Enlightenment and Emancipation, which removed traditional restrictions against the Jews.

No longer were Jews confined to their ghettos and self-contained kehilot, they were now permitted to enter into mainstream society. This work visually records the convergence of the Jewish and secular worlds and reflects the Jews' increasingly important status in German society, thus marking the introduction of a new modern period.

The challenge of defining Jewish art re-emerged in the late 19th century. Under the influence of the prevailing nationalist spirit in Europe, Jews began to revive their own ideal of Jewish nationhood in Eretz Yisrael.

The answer to the call by Jewish leaders to express the revived Zionist spirit and to unite the ingathering from the disparate Jewish world, came from the Russian sculptor and painter Boris Schatz (1866-1932).

Boris Schatz

Schatz left his professional post in Bulgaria, where he had worked to revive Bulgarian arts and crafts, to pioneer a new Jewish art. In 1903, Schatz met with Theodor Herzl to propose the founding of a national school for Jewish art. He was instrumental in the founding of the Bezalel School of Arts and Crafts which opened in 1906 in Jerusalem.

Named after the biblical artisan who was entrusted to build God's Tabernacle, this school provided visual expressions of the Zionist ideal of the Jewish return to the homeland. The Bezalel school also trained workers with useful craft skills to enable them to bring money into the impoverished Jewish settlements.

Workshops conducted at Bezalel included carpet weaving, wood carving, embroidery, decorative painting and Yemenite silver work. Iconographically, the school advocated the depiction of biblical scenes and images of the flora and fauna indigenous to the Holy Land. Modelled after Islamic arabesque and European Art Nouveau, the Hebrew alphabet became a popular decorative motif.

The works of artists from the Bezalel school were a new form of Jewish art.

During the second half of the 20th century, many American Jews were a visible presence in the art world. Some of the more prominent artists include Mark Rothko, Helen Frankenthaler, Morris Lewis, and Franz Kline.

Jewish figures also emerged as leading critics and scholars, such as Meyer Schapiro, Harold Rosenberg and Clement Greenberg.

Greenberg was a major figure in the history of modern art criticism. With the rise of Abstract Expressionism in the 1950s, this American Jew became a critical voice for form above content, which is to say that the materials, the paint and the canvas, the shapes of the images, the sheer energy of the colors and forms became the significant aspect of the work, not the story or the psychological truths they might reveal.

Although Greenberg was a Jew, he did not concede that Jewish artists needed to produce anything particularly Jewish. Greenberg addressed issues of self-criticism in modern paintings. He did not deal with his own Jewish background nor with Jewish art in general. Instead, he asserted an assimilationist position which was very popular among Jewish artists and historians of the time. It has been suggested that this conscious

The critics raved…and the celebrities dined

"Karamanos, known to his public as Arthur Carman, has certainly made it: the walls of the halls of his warmly old-fashioned restaurant are lined with pictures of celebrities, and his cuisine is thankfully untainted by the new-fangled. The specialties are steaks (with antiquated stock-yard insouciance, the menu brags of using only "four percent of the entire steer") that are fabulously bloody and bloody fabulous."
The Globe and Mail

"Reverential service and best steak in town!"
Air Canada. enRoute

"A journalist once described Arthur Carman as one part juicy steak, one part clove of garlic, one part spice – and all Zorba the Greek. There's one ingredient he has neglected to add to that recipe for success. That's Carman's own charisma as a charming host…The walls of the hallway are plastered with autographed photos of contented patrons – from Myron Cohen to Lorne Green. For a sample of Carman's culinary magic, phone 924-8697."
The Canadian Jewish News

"The biggest, the best and the most garlicky steaks in town!"
Rochester Democrat

"Simply think of steak as good as it could possibly be!"
Los Angeles Times

"Carman's club – great steaks and "delightful clutter"…with the possible exception of Ed's Warehouse, Carman's is the most "decorated" restaurant in the city. There's a little – no, there's a lot – of everything. Toby mugs, paintings, fine plates, sculptures, stained glass windows. I defy any visitor to find a four foot square of empty space. And there are flowers everywhere…The best steaks in Toronto – so tender you could cut it with a fork! Mr. Carman…you are an institution for very valid reasons. It took me a long time to get there, but I'll be back, and soon"
Toronto Star

"…Carman's front room, where the walls are festooned with every know artifact of Bacchus and the tables are equally loaded down with olives that snap in the mouth, cottage cheese mounded in a bowl like the snow-capped top of Everest, pickles that make all other pickles taste like cucumbers pickled by machine, and garlic bread that is rivaled no where else.

…we were at Carman's because my father was a member when membership was required to eat there. It's not anymore. And we were at Carman's because he served the best steaks in Toronto. A Carman's steak was so tender you could eat it with a fork. A Carman's steak was so garlicky: you could cut the aroma with a knife. A Carman's steak was so large, you didn't object to the equally large price. And the steaks came with huge baked potatoes, with butter or sour cream or both"
David Kingsmill. Toronto Star

" A typical Carman's feast – Greek olives and garlic bread, salads, steak too good to leave, wines that were just right and fine brandies! Arrive hungry, depart with a blissful glow of satisfaction."
Sarah Waxman Financial Post Toronto Sun

"One of the three best restaurants in downtown Toronto."

Jewish involvement in the fine arts omission conformed to the post-Holocaust model of Jews trying to demonstrate their American rather than their Jewish identity.

The discussion of Jewish involvement in the fine arts is not restricted to painting. There are numerous examples of Jewish sculptors, lithographers, engravers, filmmakers, and artists in various other media.

One famous photographer was Diane Nemerov Arbus (1923-1971). From the 1960s on, Arbus became preoccupied with photographing freaks, social misfits, the disturbed and the physically deformed. The Jewish Giant at Home with His Parents in the Bronx, 1970 is an example of Arbus' subject matter.

In the last decade, exhibitions such as Too Jewish? Challenging Traditional Identities at the Jewish Museum in New York in 1996 have facilitated the renewed discussion of who is a Jewish artist and what is Jewish art.

Recently, art historian Catherine M. Soussloff edited Jewish Identity in Modern Art History (1999), a comprehensive study of Jewish identity and its meaning for the history of art and its related discourses.

Marc Chagall

To train a new generation of scholars and curators in this exciting and blossoming field, the Jewish Theological Seminary of America has devised a multi-disciplinary graduate program. In partnership with the Jewish Museum and Columbia University, students engage in rigorous scholarship in the areas of Jewish studies, Jewish art and material culture, and art history, and are afforded practical training in a museum setting.

The broad study of Jewish art is intimately connected to and dependent on an understanding of the history of the Jews and of art history in general. Over time, Jewish art has moved from hiddur mitzvah, the beautification of the performance of the mitzvot, to expressing the multiplicity of hopes, dreams and experiences that comprise Jewish life.

As a testament to the acceptance of Jews into mainstream society over the last two centuries, Jews have made many significant contributions to western art as patrons, artists, historians, dealers and critics. Looking towards the future, the world of Jewish art will assuredly continue to enrich Jewish lives, challenge existing conventions and boundaries and expand in its scope and influence.

Leah Goldberg grew up in Toronto and is currently a master's student in Jewish art and material culture at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. She is also a student in the Museum Studies Program at New York University.

Elizheva Hurvich recently graduated from JTSA with her MA in Jewish art and material culture.

Jews and modern thought

Ideas entered the west indirectly

By RABBI SOL TANENZAPF

Western civilization in general, and western philosophic thought in particular, have been profoundly influenced by the Jews and by the Greeks. Matthew Arnold wrote, correctly, I think: "Hebraism and Hellenism – between these two points of influence moves our world."

It is difficult to sort out the Jewish influence from that of the Greeks, because Jewish ideas reached Europe in Greek translation. The ideas of the Greeks entered western thought indirectly, through the Romans and the Christians. The ideas of the Jews entered western thought indirectly, through the Christians and the Muslims. The ideas of the Jewish Bible about God, about human nature and human destiny, about the structure of the physical universe and about the meaning of history, are foundational to European civilization, as are its ethical ideals of justice and kindness, of the rights and dignity of the individual, and of equality before the law. However, the concept of a single cosmos and of an orderly universe, of nature governed by laws that can be grasped by the human mind, derives from both sources.

It would be somewhat artificial to separate these two strands into what was originally Greek and what was originally Jewish, since much of western thought is an attempt to weave the two strands together. Alfred North Whitehead said, "Subsequent speculation moves between these two extremes, seeking their reconciliation." In this, as in most other matters, the history of western thought consists in the attempted fusion of ideas that in their origin are predominantly Hellenic, with ideas that in their origin are predominately Semitic.

It is easier to talk about the influence of individual thinkers on the development of western philosophical thought than it is to talk about the impact of foundational ideas.

The two Jewish thinkers who most influenced the history of western philosophy in ancient and medieval times are undoubtedly Philo of Alexandria and Rabbi Moses Maimonides. These are Jewish thinkers, not just Jews who philosophize: both Philo and Maimonides write from within the circle of Jewish faith, and from within the circle of the Jewish community.

When talking of modern times, it is more difficult to specify the influence of Jews on western philosophical thought. With the exception of Martin Buber, Jews who decisively influenced modern philosophy were often not writing as Jews. Baruch Spinoza, Sigmund Freud, Albert Einstein, Ludwig Wittgenstein and A J. Ayer were not writing as Jews, nor were they interested in reconciling Jewish ideas with the ideas of the general culture.

Interestingly, none of these thinkers renounced his Jewish identity. But clearly Spinoza and Freud, Wittgenstein and Ayer are engaged in deconstructing the ideas and ideals of the biblical world-view and in replacing them with an alternative world-view and ethic.

Einstein's impact on our conception of the natural world is enormous, but it is uninfluenced by his Jewish commitments. By contrast, Karl Marx is one of the most influential thinkers in the history of western philosophy: he proved, as no one else had done, that philosophical ideas have political consequences. But he did not think of himself as Jewish, despite the fact that both those who admire the Jews and those who hate the Jews readily think of Marx as Jewish and of his utopian ideals as a secularized version of Jewish messianism.

It seems very strange to me to describe someone as Jewish who has renounced his or her Jewish identity. Consequently, I would not list Karl Marx as a Jew who influenced western philosophical thought.

When we examine the influence of Philo of Alexandria (20 BCE-50 CE) we are confronted with a number of paradoxes. First, Jews did not preserve Philo's writings nor study them until comparatively recent times; it is the Church that preserved Philo's writings. Second, his influence on western thought is indirect, mediated by Clement and Origen (both of Alexandria), and through them by St. Augustine (who is arguably Christianity's most influential thinker).

Finally, Philo was not a teacher of philosophy; he was a preacher who delivered sermons on topics in the Jewish Bible. These sermons are similar in structure to rabbinic midrashim, but not in content. Philo presented the ideas and ideals of the Jewish Bible in the form of a coherent system of thought, a system which was also consistent with the well-established ideas of science and philosophy in his time.

Harry Wolfson coined the term Philonic philosophy to describe this effort to reconcile scriptural beliefs and values with the beliefs and values of pagan Greek philosophy. Philo was one of the first thinkers to "do" religious philosophy in this sense. One can trace Philo's ideas in the religious philosophies of the Middle Ages, in the writings of Maimonides, Ibn Sina and St. Thomas Aquinas, although Philo's ideas reached the medieval writers indirectly.

In modern times, the philosophers who attempted to dismantle the medieval system of thought are still wrestling with Philo's ideas; only they are trying to disprove them. This is especially true of such secular thinkers as Baruch Spinoza, David Hume, Immanuel Kant, John Stuart Mill and Bertrand Russell.

The basic ideas of Philo's thought are (a) that the knowledge of God can be acquired in three ways: through human reason, historical revelation and personal mystical experience; (b) that God is in essence unknowable, although some knowledge of God can be acquired through God's effects in the universe; and (c) that God is infinite in goodness and in power.

It was Philo who introduced the ideal of benevolence into western ethical thought. In The Special Laws, Philo subsumes all religious and ethical duties, all the mitzvot, under two rubrics: duties towards God and duties towards human beings. This classification is arrived at independently by the rabbis and appears in rabbinic writings after Philo's time. Philo further classified all of our ethical duties, duties towards human beings, under two headings: the virtues of justice (dikaiosyne) and benevolence (philanthropia). The term philanthropia appears for the first time in the writings of Philo.

Most scholars argue that Philo introduced the term philanthropia in order to allay the mistrust of the Jews on the part of Greeks, Romans and Egyptians who accused the Jews of being people who hated other people, of being misanthropes. Jews were seen in the ancient world as hating humankind largely because they maintained their separateness and refused to join civic ceremonies worshipping the deities of the cities and of the empire. The symmetry of the two terms, philanthropia and misanthropia certainly supports this explanation.

In my opinion, Philo introduced the concept of benevolence (philanthropia, love of humanity) in order to make sense of those biblical laws or mitzvot that require Israel to go beyond the demands of justice and to care for the fatherless and the widow, the poor and the debtor, the alien and the slave.

These are duties of benevolence towards persons who are inferior or vulnerable, who are not one of us, who have no claims on us in courts of law. In the Ethics, Aristotle had made justice (dikaiosyne) and friendship (philia) the two central virtues.

Aristotle's concept of philia differs from Philo's concept of philanthropia in two significant ways: philia (friendship) can be obtained only between equals; and philia, like justice, stops at the boundaries of the city state. Neither friendship nor justice extends to aliens outside the state or to slaves within the state. Philanthropia (benevolence), on the other hand, is extended to those who are inferior to you and it applies universally to all humankind.

During the Middle Ages, the dominant figure is, of course, Moses Maimonides (1135-1204). His impact on western philosophy, like Philo's, is indirect and it is also mediated through Christian thinkers, especially St. Thomas Aquinas. St. Thomas agrees with Maimonides on certain essential points; he acknowledges Rabbi

Spinoza had major impact

Moses of Egypt as the source of many ideas. St. Thomas' key argument to prove God's existence, The Third Way, the Argument from Contingency, is a reformulation of Maimonides' argument.

St. Thomas sets out to demonstrate the harmony of faith and reason by means of the same arguments that Maimonides used. He also agrees with Maimonides that reason has limits, that certain beliefs are learned only through revelation (for example, that the universe is created). St. Thomas insists, as did Maimonides, that the essential nature of God is beyond the grasp of human reason: human beings can know that God is, but cannot know what God is.

Baruch Spinoza (1631-1677) stands at the dawn of the modern period in philosophy; his impact on the subsequent development of philosophy is second only to that of Rene Descartes. Spinoza, like Descartes, wanted to dismantle the medieval synthesis of faith and reason in order to free the new sciences from control by religious authorities.

Spinoza initiated the modern critical study of the Bible, and was one of the first thinkers in the west to defend democracy as a viable form of government and religious tolerance as an ethical and political ideal.

No doubt, his being a Jew and a descendant of Portuguese Marannos provides a partial explanation for why he included these particular ideas and ideals in his system of thought; but the rapid developments in mathematics, in astronomy and in the laws of motion, together with his own experiments in optics, had even more to do with the formulation of his system of thought.

Baruch Spinoza (1631-1677)

Less obvious but no less important is the influence of Maimonides on Spinoza's system of thought: in particular, on his espousal of the intellectual love of God as the highest ideal to which human beings can aspire. I am certain that Spinoza's concept of the intellectual love of God is derived from Maimonides' argument that the love of God is higher than reverence for God, that both the mitzvah to revere God and the mitzvah to love God can only be fulfilled by acquiring what knowledge of God is possible by reasoning from the effects of God's action in nature and Torah. Therefore, in order to fulfil the commandments to revere and love God, one must study science as well as Torah.

A ban (cherem) was issued against Spinoza by the rabbis of Amsterdam on July 27, 1656. Spinoza was condemned both for his ideas and for his conduct, for wrong opinions and behavior, and for the horrible heresies which he practised and taught. The rabbis of Amsterdam understood very well that Spinoza was rejecting the basic beliefs of the Jewish religion first formulated by Philo of Alexandria.

In addition to these three thinkers who have had a major impact on the development of western philosophy, Philo, Maimonides and Spinoza, there were innumerable Jewish thinkers who over the centuries attempted to provide a philosophical defence of Jewish belief and practice. They were engaged in doing religious philosophy, or Philonic philosophy (to use Wolfson's term).

These thinkers largely relied on others to do the science and formulate the systems of philosophy that they would use in explicating and defending Jewish belief and practice. They did not make original contributions to science or to philosophy. This prompted Julius Guttmann to say that Jewish thinkers borrowed their philosophy from the general culture and had nothing distinctive to contribute to western thought.

"The Jewish people," wrote Guttmann, "did not begin to philosophize because of an irresistible urge to do so. They received philosophy from outside sources, and the history of Jewish philosophy is a history of the successful absorption of foreign ideas which were then transformed and adapted according to specific Jewish points of view."

In my view, Guttmann underestimates the extent to which thinkers like Philo, Maimonides and Spinoza altered the ideas they appropriated from their predecessors. It happens that the three most influential Jewish thinkers were also the most original in formulating systems of philosophic thought.

Moreover, it is in our own century that a number of Jewish thinkers, especially Martin Buber, have begun to reverse the process that Guttmann describes. The dominant trend in western philosophy since the beginning of the modern period has been to reject revelation and mystical experiences as sources of knowledge, and to limit all knowledge to one source alone; that is, to scientific theory-formation. All claims to knowledge, beyond logic and mathematics, must be presented as the most adequate explanation of the facts of observation and must be tested by means of predictions.

Martin Buber has been enormously influential among thinkers studying religious philosophy or Philonic philosophy precisely because he has reintroduced revelation as a source of knowledge.

I keep being surprised by how often Buber is cited in the writings of such important contemporary thinkers as Paul Tillich, Hans Kung and John Hick. I and Thou is, of course, about human relationships, but it is also about the relationship between human beings and God. It presents a radically new concept of revelation as mediated through our relationships to subjects in the natural world, through our relationships to persons and our relationships to art and literature. Here is a philosophy, grounded in the circle of Jewish faith and in the circle of Jewish community, that challenges Western philosophy to take revelation seriously again.

Recent developments in Jewish religious thought in the writings of Buber, Franz Rosenzweig, Abraham Heschel and J.B. Soloveitchik mark a turning point in Jewish intellectual history. Distinctively Jewish ideas and ideals are being made known to the wider scholarly world. Basic Jewish beliefs and practices are being formulated and defended without the distortions caused by trying to fit them into molds derived from other cultures.

Rabbi Sol Tanenzapf is the spiritual leader of Beit Rayim Congregation in Toronto and professor of Humanities, Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

Jews and science

An astonishing array of great minds

By HENRI ROTHSCHILD

The early achievements of Egyptian and Greek civilizations, together with the remarkable developments in mathematics and astronomy during the Golden Age of Islam, created the basis for the era of modern science that began in earnest around the middle of the last century – primarily in Europe.

And it was for most of the period between 1840 and 1940 that the achievements were greatest in the German-speaking parts of Europe, the area that was also the region where the emancipation and assimilation of European Jewry was the most pronounced.

During that period, the Jewish community of Europe contributed, in both quality and quantity, an astonishing array of great scientific minds in all fields of research. In mathematics, medicine, physics and chemistry, Jewish scientists – or those of Jewish origin – dominated to an extent that by 1935, 50 percent of all of the Nobel Prizes awarded to "Germans", were, in fact, received by scientists whose origins were in the Jewish community.

Considering that Jews constituted only one percent of the total population, that not all of that community had entered the "secular world", and that enormous restrictions were placed on Jews in universities and institutions – the achievements are nothing short of miraculous!

In England, Italy, Hungary, France, and later Russia, Jewish contributions (or, for that matter, overall contributions) were not as spectacular – they were merely exceptional. For example, the four most illustrious scientists that had come out of Hungary by the 1940s – Edward Teller, Eugene Wigner, Leo Szilard and John von Neumann – were all Jews. And as the torch of scientific leadership was passed from Europe to the United States during the 1930s and 1940s and the remainder of this century, the role of Jewish scientists was prominent in both the European scientific migration and in the rise of American science.

Scientists often kept Jewish identity to themselves

This article would not do justice to the thousands of Jewish contributors to the world's scientific progress by listing only a few of the obvious giants. Nevertheless, two points are worth noting. First, it is impossible to have "empirical" evidence on the overall contribution of Jews to science and technology because such statistics have never been collected, nor could this have been possible, even assuming its desirability. One must remember, that in the 19th century and the first half of this one, the "intellectual professions," while still very restricted, were the best door of entry for Jews into the middle class world.

Conversely, it was a way out of the ghetto, and for this reason – as well as to overcome prejudice and institutional restrictions – Jewish aspirants to academic appointments often kept their identity to themselves or even converted to Christianity in order to pursue their scientific careers. One can, however, infer from the number of well-known Jewish "giants" of science that these represented the tip of the iceberg of Jewish performance.

The second point refers to the contribution of the giants. One could argue convincingly that scientific progress occurs in two manners. The first is the slow process of incrementally building, layer-by-layer, on the level of knowledge within the scientific disciplines. The vast majority of research scientists make their contributions in this way, as well as in developing their younger colleagues-to-be. However, scientific progress also occurs in "quantum leaps" when outstanding contributions are made by individuals who are responsible for breakthroughs in the way we look at the world around us. Galileo, Isaac Newton, Charles Darwin, Louis Pasteur, Albert Einstein and Sigmund Freud come to mind.

'Chance will favor the prepared mind'

play a role in such breakthroughs (i.e., if Darwin had not had the means to travel the globe and collect his specimens and data, it is unlikely that he would have come to his remarkable observations), it is worth noting a quote from Pasteur who said, "in the field of observation, chance will favor the prepared mind."

Not all of the leaders of science can be said to be of the status and importance as those mentioned above, however, amongst the other great names of science, the number of those who are Jews is striking. The following paragraphs include a sample of only a few of these individuals, and are drawn from an excellent analysis, entitled The Jews in Modern Science written almost 50 years ago by the Canadian writer A.A. Roback for a compendium edited by Dagobert D. Runes called The Hebrew Impact on Western Civilization.

It is not by accident, that among the great scientific minds of the pre-19th-century era, there are few, if any, Jews to be counted. While Maimonides and Ibn Ezra were learned in medicine and mathematics respectively, neither can be said to have advanced their respective fields of interest to the degree that the later day parade of eminent scientists did. The reasons why no Copernicus, Galileo or Newton emerged from the Jewish world are obvious. With the noted exception of the Golden Age in Spain under Muslim rule, at no period in Diaspora history was there opportunity for Jews to pursue anything but subsistence living outside of academe and trades.

Jews were drawn to math and medicine

To be fair, the same could be said of most of the European population where learning and intellectual pursuit were reserved exclusively for the upper clergy and the nobility. All this began to change with the liberalism that swept through Europe following the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Era. For Jews, it meant that the ghetto walls began to come down, and while discrimination was still overpowering, the structural barriers preventing their participation in academic life had clearly been removed. And the results were truly astounding!

Roback makes the observation that it was in two general fields of science that newly emancipated Jews began to excel – medicine and mathematics. This is interesting, because mathematics is the most theoretical or philosophical of the sciences, whereas medicine is clearly the most practical. It is beyond the scope of this overview to speculate on the reasons for this, assuming that the observation is correct. Medicine is dealt with separately in this supplement so we will begin with the field of mathematics, later covering physics and chemistry to reinforce the point.

One of the mathematicians of note in the 19th century was Carl Gustav Jacobi, who despite his brief life (he died in 1851 at the age of 46) made important developments in various aspects of mathematical theory. His works were published in seven volumes by the Prussian Academy of Science after his death. His contemporary, F.G.M. Eisenstein, who died at the even younger age of 29, wrote extensively on algebra and numbers theory. The illustrious German mathematician Carl Gauss wrote that Eisenstein "belongs to those talents who are born but once in a century."

Gauss, undoubtedly the greatest of German mathematicians, edited and published Eisenstein's collected works. Russian-born Hermann Minkowski (he, too, by sad coincidence died at the young age of 45) is often included among the ranks of theoretical physicists but only because his novel mathematical formulae were of vital importance to Albert Einstein (one of his students) in developing the basis for his early work on relativity.

In England, the name of James Joseph Sylvester (1814-1897) ranks as one of the greatest mathematical minds produced by that country. Sylvester's work covered a wide range of mathematical fields. The Royal Society in London struck a medal in his honor to commemorate his exceptional service to the field of mathematics (the first recipient of the Sylvester medal, Georg Cantor, was also Jewish.) The Cambridge University Press published seven large volumes of his collected writings even though Cambridge University did not award him a bachelor's degree until long after he had been a professor in several universities.

Apparently, the only reason for this neglect was that Sylvester was a professing Jew.

It is, however, in Italy that the contribution of Jewish mathematicians was particularly exceptional during this period. Italian Jews, who constituted slightly over 0.1 percent of the total population produced over 50 percent of its leading mathematicians. Of note were Luigi Cremona (1830-1903), a geometrician and Vito Volterra, a leading major in the field of mathematical physics. Tullio Levi-Civita (1873-1942) provided major contributions in the area of absolute differential calculus, and like Hermann Minkowski, did much of the mathematical groundwork for Einstein's theory on relativity. Levi-Civita and Volterra were the only Jewish members of the Pontifical Academy of Science – not a small feat in the Fascist Italy of the 1930s. It is remarkable that so many of Italy's illustrious scientists were of Jewish descent. In addition to the mathematicians already mentioned, the Nobel laureates in the biosciences in post-war Italy, Rita Levy-Montalcini and Salvadore Luria come to mind, as does the great chemist and author Primo Levi.

In the post-war period, the prominence of Jewish Americans in mathematics at leading universities is equally amazing. Their contribution to the rise of American science is equalled only by those involved in physics and medicine – and they are too many to mention as individuals. In Canada, one should note the work of Leopold Infeld at the University of Toronto, particularly because of his collaboration in the field of mathematical physics, with Albert Einstein.

It is perhaps in the area of physics that one commonly associates the role played by Jewish scientists during this century. This is due, in part, to the stature of one great man, Albert Einstein, and to his undeniable Jewishness. It is also due to the well-documented emigration of a large number of other eminent Jewish nuclear physicists from the Third Reich to the Allied countries, mainly the United States, and to their involvement in the development of the atomic bomb.

Other Jewish contributions to 20th-century physics are not as well known. Gabriel Lippmann (1842-1919) was one of France's first science Nobel laureates. A professor of mathematical physics at the Sorbonne and member of the Academie des Sciences, his textbooks on thermo-dynamics and light were standards in French academia for a generation. Lippmann's Nobel Prize was awarded in 1908 for his pioneering work on the process of color photography.

Over the next several decades, Jewish eminence in theoretical and mathematical physics was such that Nazi ideologues disdainfully referred to it as Judenphysik. James Franck, Max Bernhard Weinstein, Paul Ehrenfest, Phillip Franck, Wolfgang Pauli and the eminent Max Born are but a small sample of this prominence (Franck, Pauli and Born were all Nobel laureates). But, as already noted, it was in the area of atomic physics (and later sub-atomic physics) that the involvement of Jewish scientists is best known.

Lise Meitner, originally from Vienna, was the more junior of the three scientists, along with Hahn and Strassmann, who conducted the groundbreaking experiment in Berlin in 1938 which culminated in the recognition that some atoms could be split by neutron bombardment. Shortly thereafter, she and her nephew, Frisch, joined the stream of Jewish scientists fleeing the developing horror in Europe. It is doubtful that history has ever been witness to such a massive translocation of brainpower in such a short period of time (with the possible exception of the recent aliyah of Soviet Jews to Israel).

Frish, as eminent a scientist as his more famous aunt, joined Hans Bethe, Wigner, Teller, Szilard and Victor Weisskopf in the U.S. scientific effort, under J. Robert Oppenheimer, to end the war.

The rise of post-war U.S. physics was due, in no small measure to this band of Jewish émigré scientists. But indigenous American prowess had already begun to rival that of middle Europe. The first American recipient of the Nobel Prize in physics was German-born (but U.S.-educated) Albert Abraham Michelson of the famous Michelson-Morley experiment. In the finest scientific tradition, he was not only an eminent and productive researcher, but virtually all of the earlier U.S. recipients of the award were either his associates or his students. By the late 40s, 50s and beyond, in the U.S. alone, the names of I.I. Rabi, Murray Gellman, Julian Schwinger, Leon Lederman, Richard Feynman and Sheldon Glashow are names to be added to this glittering array of Jewish brilliance (all Nobel laureates).

As in physics, advances in chemistry were in the pre-World War II period, most prevalent in Germany, both as a result of their world-class universities and due to the German leadership in industrial and fine chemical industries. One of the greatest chemists of his day was Fritz Haber, a convert to Christianity, who held steadfast to his German ultra-nationalism until Nazi pressure forced him into exile.

Haber and Richard Willstatter – both Nobel Prize winners in chemistry, were major innovators in inorganic and organic/biochemistry, respectively. Again, as in the field of physics, one could fill the pages with names of illustrious contributions from Jewish researchers. Otto Wallach (1847-1931) - also a Nobel Prize laureate did innovative work in alicyclic compounds, as did Jacques Loeb in both colloid chemistry and physiology.

In England, Raphael Meldola (1840-1915) of Portuguese-Jewish ancestry, was a leading photochemist of his day. Ludwig Mond (discoverer of the Mond gas and nickel carbonyl) was a major player in the English industrial chemical industry. And of course, an important contributor to the British effort in World War I was none other than Russian-born Chaim Weizmann who, in a way, was one of the first bio-technologists to use micro-organisms in the synthetic production of chemicals.

Because this article is, in fact, a summary, the discussion on chemistry will not include the later years and the major players in Russia and North America, despite the fact that the significant beginnings in Germany and England are, to say the least, equalled in these other domains. And as chemistry and biochemistry lead to physiology and other bio-medical sciences, prominent Jewish scientists, Jacob Henle, developed here as well.

Physiology, bio-medicine

Only three general areas have been mentioned in a very superficial manner and over a restricted time period. This is to make the following point: The Jewish contribution to the advancement of science has been nothing short of outstanding. One might even make the additional point (although it is impossible to prove) that in no area of human endeavor have Jews made such a dramatic impact, despite their well-known – and indeed, better known – achievements in other fields, like law, business and the performing arts. To some degree, this is why such an account is desirable, despite the risk of sliding into ethnocentricity, and also in light of the fact that men and women of science often eschew nationalism and other collective affiliations. Why then make the point?

First, the point itself, is a remarkable one. Not making it would be an exercise in denying an amazing story of human achievement. Actually, neither Jewish history nor science history tends to treat the subject with the attention it deserves, almost as if it were a blind spot in their respective fields of vision. For example, the recent publication Servants of Nature by Lewis Pyenson and Susan Sheets-Pyenson, an otherwise excellent account of science history, does not say a word on the subject. To some degree, it is because all of the names mentioned above, and countless eminent others, are associated with their country of nationality. And from the Jewish perspective, many, if not most, of these eminent scientists were either unaffiliated with Jewish religious or secular society, or even converts for career or other reasons. Consequently, to some, this would make it inappropriate to have them considered as part of Jewish history.

3,000 years of learning

In a sense, therefore, the issue has fallen between the cracks of two worlds that do not easily intersect. Of course, a lack of science awareness and of science history is characteristic of most societies. Many papers on Canadian science policy have raised this as a key issue in overall public policy, and as one of several impediments to the development of a truly knowledge-based society and of a proper valuation of the role played by science and research.

It is doubtful that any other group can claim the kind of impact in science that Jews have had. The reasons that help explain this overachievement are certainly complex and diverse, well beyond the scope of this article. One can easily speculate that a 3,000 year tradition of learning did not hurt! That, and the coincidence of the timing of Jewish emancipation with the rise of modern science and perhaps even the anti-dogmatic tradition of the Jewish religion, especially through the study of the Talmud, are to be included in a set of conditions ripe for the potential scientific mind to flourish, bringing us back full circle to the quote by Louis Pasteur, "In the field of observation, chance will favor the prepared mind."

Of the sample of great minds mentioned in this article, it is unlikely that many will be familiar to readers. Take a look in an encyclopedia. You will get yet another perspective on what we have lost, because the conditions in Europe that gave rise to this golden age for science will never again re-appear. The brutal destruction of virtually all of middle-European Jewry, along with its rich, mostly Yiddish culture, makes that impossible. The central role that gelerenkeit played within that community and indeed throughout Jewish history, and the results in scientific and cultural outputs, is part of their legacy to human civilization.

All nations and communities take justifiable pride in the accomplishments of their scientists and scholars. They tally up their Nobel Prizes and publications and lay claim to great discoveries and innovations. They hold all of them as examples to their youth. This is yet another reason to have a complete and honest understanding of science and Jewish history and their path of intersection. Also, this story continues to this day. As the torch has been passed from Europe to North America – it has also been kept alive in Israel, where science and research is playing a central role.

It is a continued reflection of the importance that Jews attach to science and learning that the establishments of research centres in Israel predates the creation of the state. Indeed, the Yishuv was active in this field in the early days of the British Mandate with the establishment of the Technion in 1924, the Hebrew University in 1925 and, in 1934, the Daniel Sieff Institute – renamed the Weizmann Institute of Science in 1946. Despite the fact that it takes generations to put together the necessary infrastructure that enables scientific research to flourish, Israel has, in its brief history, established itself as a world class national performer. It is among the leaders in almost all of the key indicators of scientific output; number of publications per capita, citation index, scientists and engineers in the labor force, numbers of major discoveries and innovations, etc.

Jews from around the world have played a significant role in Israel's science achievements. Hundreds of endowments and foundations have been established to provide the financial means and facilities for conducting research. In this, Canadian Jews have been especially prominent. And in the past decades, the influx of almost 900,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union has bolstered Israeli capacity even further. Consistent with Jewish performance elsewhere, an astonishing 69 percent of the adult component of this latest aliyah have post-secondary education and include key leaders in Russian science and engineering. One measure of their impact, is that almost overnight, Israel has been transformed into a powerhouse in mathematics and physics. The new arrivals are contributing hugely to Israel's scientific standing as well as to its potential for even further success in high-tech industries.

Canadian Jews prominent in Israel's scientific achievements

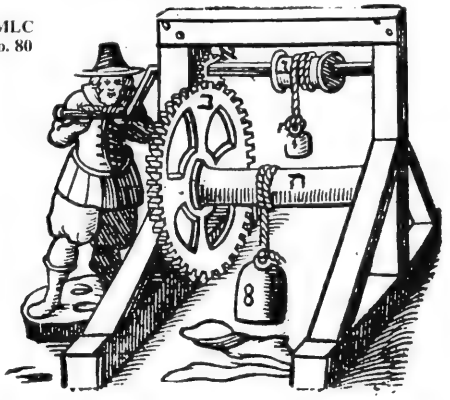
JMLC No. 80



It has been said many times that we are living in an age of accelerating technological advancement. This is brought about by a degree of scientific progress never before witnessed in human history. We are poised to map the human genome, and with it comes the promise of treating diseases associated with genetic aberrations. We are developing tools of computation and communications that stagger the imagination. Science-based innovation has become one of the most important assets for nations in preparing themselves for economic and social development in the new millennium. In Canada and in most industrialized countries, the importance of science and technology to our future is recognized as never before. The term knowledge-based economy has been coined to express the importance of education, learning and science to the generation of wealth and prosperity – and to the improvement of the human condition. Nations that fail to invest in knowledge will not realize their full potential.

Conversely, those who have invested are reaping the benefits. The incredible economic achievements of Israel in the last few decades is one of the most compelling example of this fact. With no material resources, no significant domestic market and many other well-known handicaps, Israel – one of the most educated and science-based nations of the world, has attained an economic and social standard of living that – after only 50 years of turbulent nationhood – is equal to that of western Europe.

As the century draws to a close, it is fitting that Israel has emerged as an unqualified performer in science and knowledge-based industries. The torch has indeed been passed from the remarkable performance of Jews worldwide to the Jewish State. In a way, this is a wonderful tribute to the many thousands of Jewish men and women of science who did so much for the advancement of knowledge throughout the world.

Jews and medicine

From antiquity to modern times

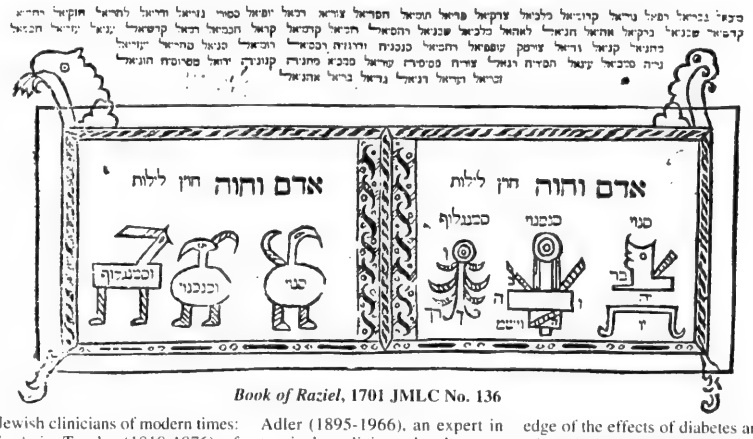
By SUSAN LIGHTSTONE

I'm proud to say that I was the first Jew to study medicine at the big medical cave. My parents were so proud. My mother was the first one in history to say, "This is my son, the doctor." She coined that phrase.

- The 2,000 Year Old Man in the Year 2000, Mel Brooks and Carl Reiner

We laugh at the truth in this joke. The special relation between Judaism and medicine has made the medical profession one of the most esteemed and honorable for a Jew to pursue. Today, on the eve of a new millennium, many Jewish parents are just as proud to say, "This is my daughter, the doctor."

"The essential service of the Jew to humanity was to be a Jew," wrote historian Cecil Roth in The Hebrew Impact on Western Civilization. Published in 1951, the book celebrates and catalogues, among many other achievements, the astonishing array of contributions made by Jews to modern medicine as creators, pathfinders, discoverers, systematizers, teachers and leaders.



Book of Raziel, 1701 JMLC No. 136

We read about one of the earliest Jewish clinicians of modern times: Ludwig Traube (1818-1876), of Silesia, the first to introduce the thermometer into practice for regular checking of the temperature of patients; Ferdinand Cohn (1828-1898) of Breslau, the father of bacteriology; Ernst Boris Chain (1906-1979), who studied in Berlin and later became a governor of the Weizmann Institute and recipient of the Nobel Prize for his role in the discovery of penicillin; and Saul Adler (1895-1966), an expert in tropical medicine who deserves much of the credit for the broad-based modern scientific inquiry and practice for which Israel is known today.

The book also gives us a brief introduction to the Friedenwald family of Baltimore – three generations of ophthalmologists, including Harry Friedenwald (1864-1950) who achieved acclaim for his important contributions to the knowledge of the effects of diabetes and tuberculosis on the condition of the eye.

Friedenwald is renowned for another exceptionally important role. His love of Judaism and medical history led him to fill a void. His three-volume The Jews and Medicine, together with his collections of books, incunabula and manuscripts, are the sources of much of what we know about the connection between Judaism and medicine, explaining the social and historical reasons for the disproportionately high number of Jewish doctors in almost all the Muslim and Christian countries from the Middle Ages on, and the significant contributions many of those doctors have made to the profession. And Friedenwald personified what is perhaps most interesting about the medical profession to Jews across history – the capacity of medicine to weave together elements of philosophy, culture and religion.

"No one can read Leviticus without amazement," wrote Friedenwald, "for the rules to avoid the spread of contagious disease and contamination are given in so detailed and definite a manner as to leave no doubt as to their purpose and effect."

He traces two of the greatest foundations of medicine to the Bible – the weekly day of rest and the direct prophylaxis of disease – and points out that this "medicine" was, at the time, unique in the world. In fact, of the 613 commandments, some 213 can be interpreted as health rules, relating to preventive medicine.

the physician and religion, however, was a complicated matter although the question was simple: Is it permissible to call on physicians for relief in illness and not to rely on God alone? Does a recourse to medicine show a lack of trust and faith in divine assistance?

By the time of Ben Sira (ca. 150 BCE), the physician had obtained a position of importance. "Honor the physician," he instructs. "From God a physician getteth wisdom." In other words, the physician is the servant who carries out the will of the Master. Friedenwald relates a late midrash: "Just as the vine without care and preparation will not grow and bring forth its fruit, but will die; so it is with the human body. Man requires herbs and medicine and the tiller is the physician."

Jewish physicians of the ancient world were profoundly influenced by the world around them. For example, the Talmud reflects the influence of Greek, Babylonian and Persian medicine.

The Talmud also set high ethical standards for the physician. "No people," wrote Friedenwald, "have laid greater emphasis upon the sacredness of life than have the Jews." One of the highest duties was to visit the sick, and this duty, according to the Talmud, must be performed equally for Jew and non-Jew, rich and poor.

Although the Jewish physician had to show special consideration for the poor, it was regarded as proper that the physician should receive adequate compensation for services. "A physician without pay is of no use," the Talmud tells us.

The tradition of the rabbi-physician began during this period, a combination that afforded a means of livelihood to those studying and teaching the word of God. Medicine, so closely aligned to religion and culture, was a natural fit for the rabbi.

The physician, who was instructed not to practice until well trained, was always expected to act

Ma'aseh Tuviyah* by Tobias Ben Moses Cohen (1652-1729). In the illustration, the body is compared to a building [JMLC]

in a humane manner. This is explained in a passage in the midrash: "Even when the physician sees that death is approaching, he still says to the patient 'Eat this and abstain from that, drink this and not that,' but he does not say 'Your end is near.'" Interestingly, the duty to treat in a humane fashion was interpreted by the most renowned rabbi-physician of the Middle Ages, Moses Maimonides (1137-1204), to permit the use of amulets, an integral part of folk medicine. In his Guide for the Perplexed, he says "Do not be led astray by the madness of writers of amulets, by what you may hear or read in them." However, he permitted an exception to be made in cases of dangerous diseases, allowing their usage "lest the mind of the patient be too greatly disturbed."

Although Maimonides and other rabbis condemned reliance on incantations and amulets, their usage never disappeared among the Jews. Even today, folk medicine, employing incantations, prayers and amulets, often together with natural remedies, has its place. Commentators report an upsurge in interest in Jewish folk medicine in Israel, for example, where folk healers are seen as mediators with the supernatural world.

But, as Friedenwald reminds us, "if there was one characteristic excellence in Jewish medicine in the Middle Ages, it was precisely in its dependence, not on authority or mystery, but on actual trial or experiment."

"Do not apply a remedy which thou hast not thoroughly tested," wrote Judah ibn Tibbon (1120-1190) for his son's guidance.

The great rationalist, Maimonides, wrote "Most men know that [medicine] is a craft which requires experience and scientific study..." Maimonides, who wrote his medical works in Arabic, was, like those before him, influenced by the culture that surrounded him.

Born in Cordoba, he fled Africa, settling in Fez. Problems there led to flight to Palestine and on to Cairo, where he became physician at the court of Saladin and his sons. But Maimonides also embraced all aspects of religion, philosophy and science, producing monumental halachic and philosophical works. (A great believer in prophylactic medicine, Maimonides also recognized the therapeutic efficacy of chicken soup early on. In his Medical Aphorisms of Moses, he recommends chicken soup as, not only an excellent food, but also as a medication which fattens the body of the emaciated and those convalescing from illness.)

Medieval Jewish physicians also made a substantial contribution as translators and authors. Through Hebrew translations of Arabic versions, ancient Greek medicine, along with contributions of Arabic medicine, was transmitted to western Europe.

Commentators of the day, such as Petrus Mosellanus, the rector of the University of Leipzig in 1518, noted, "Since diseases are common to men of all nations, remedies for these have been handed down in various fashions according to the different nature of languages...Has not this art [of medicine], like all others been learned first of all by the Jews and thence written down in the Jewish language?" These Jewish physician authors and translators also helped lay the groundwork for modern medicine by developing a scientific vocabulary in Hebrew.

The dawning of the modern era was a difficult time for Jews, and Jewish physicians were not exempt from persecution. Many European universities were closed to them. If they did graduate, they were often forbidden to treat Christian patients. The de Castro dynasty of physicians provides numerous examples of the difficulties Jewish physicians endured.

The de Castro name is found in northern Spain as early as 1079. Many members of the family met their deaths burned at the stake during the Inquisition; others fled persecution, scattering the flock across the world.

Benedict de Castro, born in Hamburg in 1597, wrote Apologia, one of the most important defences of Jewish physicians of the day. We know that Jacques de Castro (1802-1876), following a Parisian education, served as the consulting physician to the sultans of Constantinople.

By Jacques de Castro's time, the world began to see an increasing interest in the natural sciences, revolutionizing the practice of medicine. As universities began to open their doors to Jews, they were able to participate in this transformation.

Until the 1930s, the main developments in medicine took place in Europe, particularly Germany. The racial laws introduced in Germany in the mid-1930s provided the impetus for many Jewish physicians to emigrate to England and North America. This coincided with the emerging prominence of American medicine.

Otto Loewi provides an apt example of this move. Awarded the Nobel Prize in 1936 for his discoveries relating to chemical transmission of nerve impulses, Loewi was one of those who left Europe.

After being imprisoned by the Germans for two months and stripped of his possessions, he left Austria in 1938, ultimately settling in New York. (The mention of the Nobel Prize cannot be left without noting that, since its inception in 1899, over 40 Jews have been honored with the award for their contributions to biological and medical research, including: Rosalyn Yalow for the development of radio-immunoassay for the peptide hormones; Rita Levi-Montalcini for her work in cell biology; Selman A. Waksman for his discovery of streptomycin, the first antibiotic effective against tuberculosis.)

In the modern era too, much like the days that preceded it, the contributions of many Jewish physicians were still closely tied – limited, some might say – to their being Jews. Jews were often restricted in where, what and how they could practise medicine.

Early Canadian history provides an example of the difficulties faced by Jewish doctors in the person of Dr. Aaron Hart David (1812-1882), one of Canada's first Jewish physicians and a member of one of Canada's first Jewish families. Active in Montreal's Jewish community, he founded and later became dean of the faculty of Bishop's College, which opened in 1871. Back in 1840, however, David was forced out of Montreal to a new practice in Three Rivers because anti-Jewish prejudice made it impossible for him to make ends meet. "I was...without any prospects of my practice increasing sufficiently to enable me to meet the required expenses of an increasing family; the reason for which I attribute to religion," David wrote in his diary.

"People have such an aversion to a Jew. There is a capital opening [in Three Rivers] and people have not the same aversion to our religion as in Montreal."

Jews enjoyed a higher representation in the medical profession than their percentage of the population would seem to warrant. In the 1930s, in Vienna, approximately 60 percent of physicians were Jews. In addition, Jewish women made up a disproportionately large number of Jewish physicians in central Europe of the day.

Similar trends could be seen in certain Canadian cities. In Winnipeg of the 1940s, Jews made up 7.5 percent of the population, yet nearly 20 percent of the city's doctors were Jews. Despite their numbers, Jewish physicians, like David before them, faced serious restrictions.

"Although Canada is a young country, and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has ascertained that the increase of doctors, clergymen and veterinary surgeons has not kept pace with the increase in population, nevertheless, attempts to limit the number of Jewish students permitted to enter certain professional schools in some universities have been made. Unjustifiable as these attempts are when the method adopted is to demand a higher academic standing from Jewish applicants, it is still worse when, as in some few universities, the number of Jewish students admitted is arbitrarily limited," wrote Louis Rosenberg in Canada's Jews: A Social and Economic Study of the Jews in Canada in 1939. McGill University, for example, limited Jewish admissions to 10 percent until the 1960s.

Nor was a medical degree a guarantee of a position upon graduation. Many universities around the world would not accept Jews as professors. In Toronto, for example, until 1960, most Jewish graduates left for their internship years, because the city's hospitals would not accept them.

This type of discrimination led many Jewish physicians to open their own clinics and practice in fields that didn't attract their non-Jewish colleagues.

At one time, dermatology was referred to in Germany as Judenhaut. Many skin diseases bear the name of their Jewish discoverers: Karposi's sarcoma, Unna's disease and Schamberg's disease.

It's been suggested that the attention given by Mosaic law to skin ailments, cleansing and hygiene may be a source of this interest.

Interestingly, Canada's first Jewish woman doctor, Regina

Jews make up 30 percent of world's psychiatrists

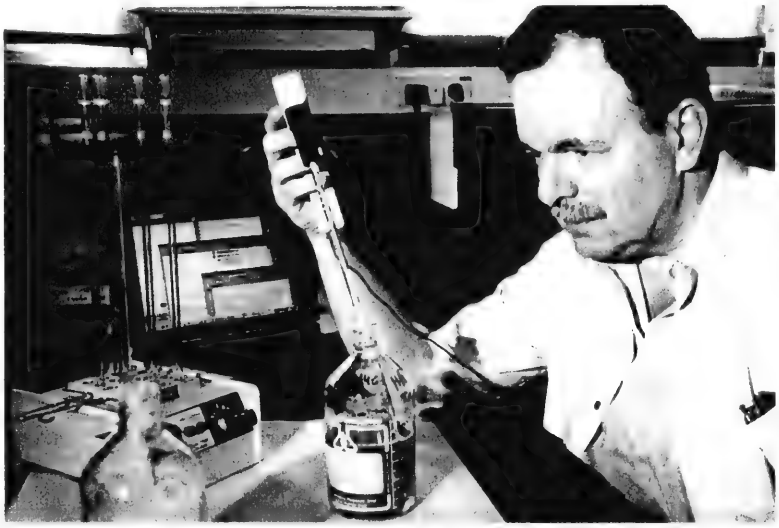
Lewis-Landau (1875-1950), made hygiene one of her specialties. Following her graduation from Bishop's Medical College in 1895, she became involved in volunteer relief work in the settlement area of Montreal, teaching young immigrant wives and mothers the basic principles of hygiene. Sounds simple today, but in the 1890s, this was revolutionary information.

And then there is the field of psychiatry. It is estimated that Jews make up some 30 percent of the world's psychiatrists. Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), who transformed the way we view human behavior, explained the connection: "It is perhaps no mere coincidence that the first representative of psychoanalysis was a Jew. Advocating it demanded a substantial degree of readiness to accept the fate of being isolated in the opposition, a fate more familiar to the Jew than to anyone else."

The fact of isolation helps to explain the vast number of Jewish hospitals around the world. Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto is a case in point. Its origins date back to 1917, when a Jewish women's benefit association founded the Jewish Old Folks' Home.



U.S.-born Prof. Stephen Berger of Tel Aviv University, is an expert in "travel medicine," whose software program GIDEON is highly successful in diagnosing rare and infectous diseases mostly found in Third World countries [WZPS photo by Sammy Avnisan]

A shortage of beds for Jewish patients facing language barriers and requiring kosher food was compounded by the fact that Jewish physicians and nurses faced employment discrimination in the city's non-Jewish hospitals.

Many of the women, led by Dorothy Goldstick Dworkin, who had raised funds for the Old Folks' Home turned their attentions to the foundation of a hospital. By 1922, Mount Sinai Hospital opened a 30-bed facility on Yorkville Avenue. In 1962, it was designated as a University of Toronto teaching hospital.

The history of the Sir Mortimer B. Davis Jewish General Hospital of Montreal is remarkably similar.

Jewish hospitals cannot be discussed without a mention of the hospitals, physicians and nurses in the ghettos during the Holocaust. By 1933, there were 48 Jewish hospitals in Poland. As Jews were forced into the ghettos, medicine went with them, together with a valiant attempt to uphold beliefs and medical tenets. A "medical faculty" existed in the Warsaw Ghetto. Under the guise of sanitation, hundreds of people received extensive medical training. In addition to teaching, the faculty conducted research – most of which focused on the characteristics of starvation in its various forms.

The years leading up to World War II, and those which followed it, saw a large influx of immigrant physicians to Palestine, particularly from Germany. They found a well developed, comprehensive, centralized health care system known as the Kupat Cholim.

Medical progress in Palestine had been rapid. The first Jewish physician, Simon Frankel, arrived in 1843. He was brought to Jerusalem by Sir Moses Montefiore.

Major medical research

During those early years, Hebrew was revived as a scientific language.

After the State of Israel was established, the government extended its responsibilities for health services. Today, the country is well-known for its major medical research.

The ratio of physicians to population in Israel is more than one to 350, one of the highest in the world, and health care is both accessible and comprehensive, based on the Jewish traditions of community and mutual aid.

Canada, too, has produced a collection of illustrious physicians. The "Four Gs" – Goldbloom, Goldblatt, Greenspon, and Gross – of the faculty of medicine, McGill University, class of 1916, were legends of their day. They stood at the top of their class. Dr. Alton Goldbloom went on to pioneer pediatrics in Canada. Dr. Harry Goldblatt, a pathologist, became one of the world's experts on blood pressure. Dr. Sy Greenspon was among the leading activists promoting the building of the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal, and Dr. Louis Gross established himself as a cardiologist, working on coronary circulation at the Mount Sinai Hospital in New York.

JMLC No. 98

The medical tradition continues. This year, Dr. Louis Siminovitch, director of research at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto, received one of the medical world's greatest honors, induction into the National Academy of Sciences in Washington for his genetic research.

Comedian Sam Levenson once wrote a biting response to an anti-Semite who had sent him a letter attacking Jews. Levenson's response was a catalogue of medical achievements over the years by Jews.

"Dear Sir – It's a free world. You don't have to like Jews, but for those of you who don't like Jews I suggest you boycott certain Jewish products: the Wasserman Test for syphilis; digitalis, discovered by Dr. Minkofsky; chlorohydrate for convulsions, discovered by Dr. Casamir Fink; streptomycin, discovered by Dr. Selman Waksman; the polio pill by Dr. Albert Sabin; and the polio vaccine by Dr. Jonas Salk."

To conclude, we draw readers' attention to an item in the news that happened less than two months ago. It typifies and symbolizes the Jewish inclination to medicine and the healing arts.

On July 31, 1999, Dr. Jacob Hollenberg, a renowned Canadian physician, died in Winnipeg. Hollenberg was born in Winnipeg in 1914, the youngest of seven children. He followed in the footsteps of his four older brothers by attending medical school at the University of Manitoba.

He became a physician in 1937, serving as a lieutenant in the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps in World War II. After the war, he joined his four brothers at the Hollenberg Clinic in Winnipeg.

In the many tributes to Jacob Hollenberg, one phrase stands out – telling not only about the Hollenberg family, but also the Jewish medical tradition of care, charity and community across the ages. "His death represents the end of one era and the beginning of another, as his children, along with his many nieces and nephews carry on in the tradition of excellence that he and his siblings began."

Jews and music

From the ghetto to the ghetto-blaster

By GARY BARWIN

Are White Christmas or The Christmas Song ("Chestnuts roasting on an open fire...") more Jewish than the most famous instrumental setting of Kol Nidrei?

It's a question that needs to be asked when assessing the contribution of Jews to the music of the past millennium. Both Christmas songs were written by Jews (Irving Berlin and Mel Torme, respectively) and Max Bruch, composer of Kol Nidrei for cello and piano, wasn't Jewish.

However, the fact that these Christmas songs were composed by Jews is more than a curiosity. It points to the fact that for much of the past 1,000 years, Jewish musicians, if they were to be successful, had to adopt the artistic values (and often the religion) of the dominant culture of their time. This leads us to ask the questions of whether these Jewish musicians brought something distinctively Jewish to their work. Were they informed by some inherently Jewish perspective, and was their career influenced in some way by their Jewishness?

Arnold Schoenberg
JMCL

But even the question of who is a Jew is complex. Moses Mendelssohn, Gustov Mahler, and Arnold Schoenberg all, at some point in their lives, converted to Christianity. And is having Jewish forebears enough to qualify one as a Jewish contributor to music? In some cases, even if the particular musicians did not consider themselves Jewish, or had fundamentally allied themselves with the dominant culture (for example Mahler) often their Jewishness became a significant issue in the eyes of anti-Semites especially when they fell into disfavor. "You might not consider yourself a Jew, but we do."

Indeed one indicator of the influence of Jewish musicians on the musical life of the West are the diatribes against Jewish musicians by prominent musicians such as Richard Wagner who were certainly aware of the flourishing presence of Jewish musicians in all aspects of musical culture beginning in the 19th century.

In this overview of the contribution of Jews to the musical culture of this millennium, we will consider musicians of Jewish heritage and try to note where they existed, and their significant Jewish-inspired works. We won't consider klezmer (now experiencing a fantastic rebirth) and other Jewish popular music, Jewish traditional, sacred and cantorial music apart from the Western art music tradition. We will however, consider mainstream Western popular music. Would anyone let me get away with writing about Jewish musicians without mentioning Al Jolson or Bob Dylan?

Jewishness in Music

We first considered Irving Berlin and Mel Torme, but what of Max Bruch's Kol Nidrei and the influence of Jewish music itself? Is there a particularly "Jewish" way of composing, a particular musical feature that has been part of Jewish heritage and that has influenced musical culture at large? The musicologist Paul Nettl finds Jewish antecedents for many of the characteristic features found in the music of the early Church from which Western Art music developed. He writes, in his article, Judaism and Music, that the Hebrew ritual, which is "founded on the principle of question and answer," was most likely the ultimate source of "the principle of antiphony (i.e. alternation) which was an extremely significant part of early Christian musical worship. This principle developed into the antiphonal and responsorial forms found throughout early church music, and subsequently became one of the most important characteristics of the Baroque: the contrasting of different music forces.

Nettl cites other scholars who believe that modality, which developed into modern tonality (the major-minor tonal system), had its origin in the tetra-chordal system of the Hebrew synagogue song.

Regardless of the traceability of specific details, it is clear that the musical culture of the Jews, as with other aspects of Jewish culture, was a source of inspiration for the early Christian Church, and as a result, played a role in the development of Western music.

The 19th-century writer, Heinrich Berl, (also cited by Nettl) believed that there were fundamental Jewish traits that can be discerned in the work of Jewish musicians. Berl, noting that historically, Jewish music was monophonic, believed that Jews focused on the melodic line to the exclusion of harmony and counterpoint. He points to a certain emphasis on melody in the work of such Jewish composers as Mendelssohn, Giacomo Meyerbeer, and Jacques Offenbach.

Jewish traits found in music

In addition to being of dubious validity, Berl vastly oversimplifies the issue. Firstly, most of the musical cultures east of Europe, and much of the folk music traditions of Europe itself, are monophonic. And secondly, such a broad characteristic as melodic emphasis can be found throughout the musical traditions of the West. The kind of assumption that Jews could only bring one thing to the musical table (a focus on melody) and that they wouldn't be able to be fully engaged in the creative developments of the culture around them is highly questionable, in addition to being false.

There are of course, certain musical specifics drawn directly from Jewish tradition that find their way into individual works. For example: the use of traditional melodies whether explicitly (the various versions of Kol Nidrei) or implicitly (Offenbach snuck some synagogue melodies into his work), certain modes or melodic patterns that are drawn from Jewish sacred or secular music, or even from shofar calls (Ernst Bloch's Schelomo.)

From the Ghetto to the Stage

Before Jews were able to fully participate in mainstream musical life, the gates of the ghettos had to be opened. It required the end (or at least the relaxing) of laws restricting Jews from most professions, and restricting where Jews could live. This didn't begin to happen until the end of the 18th century, when across Europe and North America, Jews began to be emancipated.

There were however some notable Jewish musicians before this, particularly in Italy. Salomone Rossi (c.1565-1628) was the most prominent. Employed at the court of Duke Vincenzo I of Gonzago at Mantua (who seemed to have a particular liking for Jewish musicians), Rossi wrote well-received music in the predominant Italian madrigal idiom of the day. Indeed, he became so favored (and this is the kind of detail that makes one remember exactly the position of Jews even in the comparatively liberal Italy of the time) that he was exempted from wearing a yellow star, though he still added the suffix Ebreo to his name. Unlike many Jewish musicians, Rossi maintained his religion and wrote music for the synagogue, though in his customary secular style. His sister, as "Madama Europa" achieved wide fame as a singer throughout Europe.

Sebastian Munster JMLC No. 39

Much later, though still before the emancipation of the Jews, Lorenzo da Ponte (1749-1838) also an Italian, contributed to three of the greatest operas in the entire canon. He was the librettist of Mozart's Italian operas The Marriage of Figaro (1786), Don Giovanni (1787), and Cosi fan tutte (1790). Like many Jews at the time, he had converted with his family, taking on the name of a bishop, and this allowed him access to mainstream society.

The French revolution had promised equal rights for the Jewish population, and Jews in France were emancipated in 1791, before the rest of Europe. Thus Jewish musicians were able to establish themselves in the forefront of their art. Three Jewish opera composers seized the popular imagination of France in the first half of the 19th century: Meyerbeer (originally Jakob Liebman Beer; 1791-1864), Jacques Fromental Halevy (1799-1862) and Offenbach (1819-1880).

Meyerbeer established himself as one of the most prominent and successful composers of opera, leader of the school of French grand opera which featured spectacular effects, vast crowd scenes, ballets, and choruses at every turn. His most acclaimed work is the grandiose Les Huguenots of 1836. His funeral in Berlin was carried out according to strict Jewish law, and members of the Prussian royal family led a huge procession.

Halevy also wrote grand operas. In his masterpiece, La Juive (1835), Rachel, the Jewish woman of the opera's title, can only escape her fate if she renounces Judaism. (Interestingly, Meyerbeer's Les Huguenots is also about religious intolerance.) Halevy maintained a relationship with his Judaism, writing a number of sacred works.

The witty, piquant style of opera buffa was established by the third prominent Jewish opera composer of the time: Offenbach, the son of a cantor. His best known works are Orphée aux enfers (1858) and La belle Hélène (1864). Offenbach's operas were an important influence on other later styles of comic opera, for example those of Gilbert and Sullivan.

Jacob Ludwig Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (1809-1847) is considered one of the great composers, known for such works as his E-minor Violin Concerto, his music for A Midsummer Night's Dream, and his symphonies. He was eminent as a conductor, pianist, and composer throughout the Europe of his time. He was also credited with the 19th-century revival of the music of Bach, notably through his performances of the St. Matthew Passion, of which he said, "To think that it should be…a Jew who [gave] back to the people the greatest of Christian works."

He came from an affluent, cultured, established family – his father was a town councillor in Berlin – and his grandfather was the influential Enlightenment philosopher and advocate of emancipation, Moses Mendelssohn.

The Mendelssohn family converted (and added the Bartholdy,) likely to be able to participate in not-yet emancipated German society, although also out of genuine conviction. Indeed, Mendelssohn married the daughter of a pastor.

From an early age, Mendelssohn was a prolific composer. His sister Fanny Mendelssohn was a lieder composer of some significance.

Felix Mendelssohn

Beginning in the 19th century, Jews made their musical mark as performers (often as composer-performers.) They performed with the great orchestras, taught in the most prestigious conservatories, and were associated with the greatest composers. Once Europe became emancipated, the flow of eminent violinists, pianists, conductors, and other performers began. Beginning with the pianist-composer, Ignaz Moscheles (1794-1870), we can name many pianists leading up to the 20th century: Ignac Tedesco Alfred Gruenfeld, Anton and Nicholas Rubinstein, Artur Schnabel, Artur Rubenstein, Rudolf Serkin, Wanda Landowska (who re-introduced the harpsichord), Edward Steuermann, Louis Moreau Gottschalk, Vladimir Horowitz and George Antheil.

The violin has always had pride of place in Jewish tradition, beginning with travelling Jewish minstrels. There have been innumerable violinists of note from the past to the present including: Joseph Joachim (an influential friend and colleague of Brahms'), Wilhelm Ernst, Jascha Heifetz, Fritz Kreisler, Nathan Milstein, Isaac Stern, Yehudi Menuhin, Pinchas Zukerman and Itzhak Perlman. Cellists include David Popper, Emanuel Feuermann, Gregor Piatigorsky, and Leonard Rose.

One could not imagine the leading orchestras and opera houses of the 20th century orchestra without the long list of important Jewish conductors: Gustav Mahler, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky, Walter Damrosch, Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer, Georg Szell, Eugene Ormandy, Leonard Bernstein, James Levine and Daniel Barenboim, to list only a few of the most prominent.

In addition to being an impor-

Mahler bridged two worlds

tant conductor, Mahler (1860-1910) bridged two worlds. He was one of the last great composers of the Austro-German tradition, and one of the first of the 20th century.

Though born a Jew, he converted to Catholicism as an adult. A collection of what he took to be German folk poetry was the inspiration for most of his nine symphonies and his vocal works. In his life, career, and aesthetic interests, he was part of the mainstream of the Germanic tradition. Indeed, he was the conductor of several of the preeminent musical establishments of the time: the Metropolitan Opera, the New York Philharmonic, and the Vienna Opera. Toward the end of his life, there was a campaign waged against him by the anti-Semitic press in Vienna, which precipitated his move to New York.

Gustav Mahler JMCL

Unlike Mahler, the Swiss-born American resident Ernest Bloch (1880-1959) was greatly inspired to write music based on his Jewish heritage. His most acclaimed works are unabashedly Jewish, emotional and spiritually intense, often integrating allusions to sacred chant and the music of the shofar. These include Schelomo, Voice in the Wilderness (both for cello and orchestra) and his Israel symphony. Bloch also wrote music intended for the synagogue.

Darius Milhaud (1892-1974), one of the members of the famous Les Six, was surely one of the most prolific composers of the 20th century. He is, perhaps, best known for his La Création de la monde, one of the earliest orchestral scores to use jazz and blues. Though he saw himself as "a Frenchman from Provence, and by religion a Jew," he was a musical omnivore, devouring diverse musical traditions including jazz and Brazilian music and writing for every media. His religious heritage was one of the significant influences on his music, and he wrote many Jewish-inspired works, including Service sacré (Sacred Service), Ani maamin, and a biblical opera, David (commissioned to celebrate the 3,000th anniversary of Jerusalem.)

A 20th-century innovator

In the first decades of the 20th century, Albert Einstein devised a theory that changed how the 20th century thought about the universe.

Around the same time, an Austrian Jewish composer, Arnold Schoenberg (1874-1951), steeped in the tradition of western music, devised a theory that changed the way that the 20th century thought about the musical universe.

Schoenberg realized that by the beginning of the 20th century, traditional harmony had developed to the breaking point. It had become so complex that its utility as a means of organizing music was strained. He believed that a new harmonic theory was required to provide a coherent path forward.

Schoenberg's new system (serial, or 12-tone music) was an entirely revolutionary way of thinking of music, even if the music created within it was a direct development of the soundworld of the music that came before it.

Schoenberg's innovation was to free music from its reliance on the tonal system. Music wouldn't be in one key or another; one note wouldn't be privileged. A single tonal centre would no longer be a composition's centre of gravity. Instead, each note would be equal. For each piece, the 12 notes of western music would be ordered into a distinctive "tone row" that would be repeated in a variety of permutations throughout the composition.

The tone row, or series, is responsible for shaping the melodic and harmonic content of the music.

Schoenberg, Stravinsky 20th century pillars

If there is any question of serial music's expressive potential, Schoenberg's A Survivor from Warsaw, one of a number of Jewish works written toward the end of his life, is a most powerful answer. This work for reciter, men's choir and orchestra is based on Schoenberg's own text describing a remarkable and true event from the last days of the uprising in the Warsaw ghetto. As a group of men are being led to their death by the Nazis, they spontaneously break into the singing of the Shema. The moment where the men's chorus takes over from the first-person narration and begins to sing the Shema is one of the most potent and shocking in all of Western music, chilling and inspiring at the same time.

Schoenberg came from an Orthodox Jewish family. He converted early in his life in order to gain full access to mainstream society. The rise of fascist anti-Semitism caused Schoenberg to reclaim his Judaism in 1933. For the same reason, he immigrated to California a few years later. Some of his important works include: Pierrot Lunaire, Verklarte Nacht, the opus 11, 19 and 25 piano works, and an unfinished opera, Moses und Aron which has been performed from sketches.

Schoenberg, together with Igor Stravinsky, were the two pillars of 20th century composition.

Star (of David) Spangled Banner

It seems that America in the 20th century was a particularly congenial place for Jewish musicians, whether they were native-born or immigrants. Jewish musicians flourished in all aspects of musical life, both serious and popular. Many of the eminent conductors cited above, at one time or another, conducted a major American orchestra, and much of the popular music was written or performed by Jews.

In fact, just as many of the films of early Hollywood were created by Jews, much of the music that was considered quintessentially American, was also created by Jews. And, just as in the movies, it had nothing to do with Jewish culture. Writers for Tin Pan Alley, and Broadway and other musical theatre included Irving Berlin, George Gershwin, Jerome Kern (Show Boat), Richard Rogers (Oklahoma), and Kurt Weill (The Three Penny Opera), Jerry Herman (Hello Dolly), Stephen Sondheim (A Little Night Music), and Leonard Bernstein (West Side Story.) "I can't name five famous composer-lyricists for Broadway that weren't Jewish," Jerry Herman said in an interview with the Jewish Bulletin of northern California.

The American popular theatre, long accustomed to musicals by Jews but not about them, finally got a Jewish story with Fiddler on the Roof.

Jews were extremely significant in other areas of popular music. In 1927, vaudeville singer and son of a cantor, Al Jolson, left his emotional and black-faced mark on music history by singing in the first "talkie," the first motion picture to have sound.

A decade later, clarinetist and bandleader Benny Goodman established his style of big band jazz as the predominant dance music. His style of swing music, originated from contemporary black jazz, and was much "hotter" than the prevailing white styles. Goodman, as a Jew, was a rarity in the jazz world. He was the first prominent white musician to include black musicians in his ensembles. He was also one of the first jazz musicians to perform classical music, commissioning many new works, including a concerto by Aaron Copland.

In the 1960s, an entirely different kind of musician, Robert Allen Zimmerman, aka Bob Dylan, came rambling into New York City and become one of the most influential singer/songwriters in popular music.

His many songs, such as Blowing in the Wind and The Times They are A-changin encapsulated the concerns of youth culture as it emerged as a significant force in 1960s America. His songs, whether they had a folk-like directness or a witty slyness about them, brought new literary quality to the lyrics of rock music.

Gershwin and Copland are the two composers most identified with American concert music. Like Dylan, they both explored the musical culture of North America, rather than that of their Jewish ancestors. They were also often inspired by music outside of dominant society, for example, the folk music of the American blacks and of Latin America.

Gershwin (1898-1937) was a successful and prolific composer of popular songs and Broadway shows. He wrote 28 shows in total, one of which received the Pulitzer Prize. His Rhapsody in Blue, together with his few other concert works, introduced the jazzy sound of the American city to the orchestral stage. His opera Porgy and Bess, a "folk opera" written for black singers, introduced several songs (such as Summertime) into the standard repertoire.

Though Copland (1900-1990) wrote in all musical media and genres, he is best known for such popular orchestral scores as Appalachian Spring, Billy the Kid, Rodeo, and Fanfare for the Common Man. His music draws from many American folk traditions, incorporating fiddle music, Shaker hymns, and Latin American dance forms. His tuneful, vital, sonorous music has been a tremendous influence on many American composers.

Immense contribution

Beginning in the 1960s, the Jewish American composer Steve Reich, along with Philip Glass and a few others, developed a tremendously influential and popular style and approach to art music composition called "minimalist music." This music, heavily influenced by African and Asian sources, is made of small melodic or rhythmic units that repeat and gradually change, sometimes by the addition or subtraction of notes, sometimes by changing rhythmic relations with each other. Much of this music, and this is certainly the case with Reich's, is bright and not dissonant. Minimalism has been one of the major influences on new music in the last part of the century.

Midway through his career, Reich began including explicitly Jewish content in his work. The psalm-setting for voices and chamber orchestra, Tehillim, was written after a study of Jewish sacred cantillation practices.

Reich's music had always included small modular units which recur. Tehillim retains something of this mosaic-like melodic patterning shared with Jewish sacred chanting. Different Trains (which received a Grammy award) uses the voices of Holocaust survivors. It is based on the fact that as a child, Reich, an American Jew, would take a cross-country train to visit his father during the war. At the same time, many European Jews were taking "different" trains to the Nazi death camps. Reich has continued writing Jewish-inspired works, including The Cave about the prophet Abraham.

From the Ghetto to the Ghetto-Blaster

The Jewish contribution to the music of the West has been immense. Imagine what our musical world would be like without the presence and influence of Mendelssohn, serial music, Mozart's Italian operas, minimalism, grand opera, Mahler, Dylan, and the innumerable popular songs written by Jewish composers such as Gershwin?

It would be unrecognizable.

And this is without even considering the vast number of Jewish performers, conductors, musicologists, producers, inventors (it was a Jew who invented the phonograph as we know it) and teachers of music.

The story of the Jewish contribution to western music is also the story of the social and political position of the Jews.

At the beginning of the millennium, Jewish musicians were not able to participate in mainstream society. Gradually over the centuries, some Jews were granted limited rights, but they were certainly not able to share the music of their tradition. Then, beginning in the 19th century, Jews began to be able to fully participate in Western culture – as long as they were musically assimilated.

It wasn't until the 20th century that Jews could write Jewish-influenced music in the culture at large.

Currently there is something of a renaissance of Jewish music. There are numerous Jewish music festivals featuring everything from traditional Klezmer to avant-garde collages of cantorial music and free jazz.

The important American composer/saxophonist John Zorn is recording new works of "radical Jewish culture" on his Tzadik label. And there's even a recording of White Christmas sung in Yiddish by the actor/singer Mandy Patinkin. Now is that Jewish, or what?

Gary Barwin, PhD, is a writer and composer. He directs the Composers in Electronic Residence Program, teaching music composition online to students around the globe. His latest books are The Magic Mustache (Annick Press) and Outside the Hat (Coach House).

Jews and political thought

West aware of contributions

By LOUIS GREENSPAN

When I was in Warsaw in 1993 I came across a volume in English, entitled (if I remember correctly) They Lived Among Us.

It was a volume written in the spirit of those treatises with titles such as The Jew in Sports. Those kinds of books used to be popular as gifts for bar mitzvahs decades ago and were designed to enhance the self esteem of the recipients by revealing details of the Jewish origins of well-known athletes.

The well-intentioned authors of They Lived Among Us cited the contributions of leading Jewish figures through the ages such as Baruch Spinoza and Felix Mendelsohn and others, whom the reader might not be expected to know were Jewish, or to know what they had contributed.

For a Canadian Jew, the volume was a tragic reminder of the disappearance of Polish Jewry rather than a heartening celebration of Jewish accomplishment. In our part of the world, Jewish contributions to western culture are widely recognized. They have been widely commented upon and have received glowing testimonials.

The democratic west is generally aware of the Jewish contributions to its political ideals and, in particular, to the liberal democratic political culture. We encounter fragments, images and symbols from Jewish sources almost every day of our political lives. We encounter them in the biblical cadences of the inaugural addresses of American presidents, or in the phrases of the Hebrew prophets that adorn the buildings of the United Nations.

Such images appear almost at random. A recent volume on the history of the American civil rights movement is entitled The Parting of the Waters. Recalling the famous scene from the book of Exodus, a volume on the history of our own Reform party is entitled Storming Babylon.

In addition, the names of figures who contributed to the development of our political traditions are securely established in the canon of political thought. Spinoza is recognized as one of the early theoreticians of liberal democracy.

Moses Mendelsohn, the Orthodox maskil, formulated one of the most influential theories of the separation of religion and state.

The works of contemporary Jewish political philosophers who draw on Jewish sources are prominent in the curricula of political philosophy wherever it is taught. One need only recall among many others, Michael Walzer as a thinker of the left and Leo Strauss, a thinker of the right. Both these men have distinguished followers in Canadian universities.

In recent years the Orthodox Jewish thinker Emmanuel Levinas, who writes on the relationship between morality and politics, has attracted a large following and is said to be the favorite philosopher of the Pope.

Finally, we must note those authors, Jewish and non Jewish, who remind us that Judaism has contributed more than symbols and learned texts of philosophy to the political culture of the west. These authors call attention to ideas that are so fundamental that we are barely conscious of them, ideas we could not exorcise and still be who we are.

One recent account of such ideas is contained in a widely read volume by the Irish writer Thomas Cahill. In this volume, Cahill credits the Jews for contributing a number of the primal assumptions of western civilization.

He argues that the assumption of the sacred worth of the individual, the notion of time as a forward movement to the unknown (rather than a cyclical movement where everything repeats itself), and the idea of our inescapable obligation to social justice, are "gifts of the Jews."

I would object to Cahill's idea that individualism is a product of Protestantism, that the world is divided between those nations who have experienced the Protestant Reformation and those that haven't. Jews belong to both.

But the other concepts on

Judaism and our political ideals

Cahill's list such as the conviction that time is a spiritual movement towards God's Kingdom – namely Messianism – and the prophetic insistence on the priority of social justice are surely rooted in Jewish sources.

Someone, a comedian, I presume, was fond of saying that when you are in love the whole world is Jewish. I don't know whether Romeo and Juliet would have agreed, but it is more plausible to say that when you are in politics the world seems very Jewish.

Thus we in Canada or the rest of the western world don't need the kind of reminder that is contained in They Lived Among Us or the kind of recognition that feminists and other scholars rightly seek for their constituencies.

The connection between Judaism and our political ideals, especially liberal democracy, has long been recognized. Today questions about the role of Judaism in western civilization are bound up with the questioning of the basics of western civilization and the ideals that have erupted in the past two decades. Some of the fundamentals of Judaism are questioned by some constituencies and some of the fundamentals of western liberalism are questioned by others, including Jews.

Do we still believe in this connection between the fundamentals of Judaism and the fundamentals of liberal democracy, now that the political and social world are convulsed by globalization, and the cultural world by postmodernisms, and the attendant social movements, such as religious fundamentalism?

Within the Jewish world this alliance is attacked by those who fear the lure of liberal civilization, that is, the threat of assimilation, and those who are still dismayed by its betrayals, such as during the refugee crisis in the late '30s. Is it possible that the alliance between Judaism and western liberal thought that we have assumed, was the product of an alliance forced by adversaries who attacked both?

In the middle of this century a spiritual bond between Judaism and liberal democracy was forged because both were beset by adversaries from the outside. In the last century Friedrich Nietzsche (who was not an anti-Semite) acknowledged that the alliance with modern secular liberalism was a new embodiment of Judaism and Christianity, but he rejected the egalitarianism of democracy and of Judaism. Anti-Semites took up and distorted Nietzche's message and since they hated both liberalism and democracy, they argued strenuously that liberal ideals were the inventions of Jewish conspirators.

When Cecil Roth published his magisterial The Jewish Contribution to Civilization in 1938, he scarcely realized that he might have issued an obituary both of the Jews and of the west. Within three years some of the illustrious centres of the civilization that he was honoring would sink into a dark night of fascism, discarding its Jewish heritage and setting out to discard its Jews.

This alliance remained firm after the war, partly because of the continuing threat of Stalinism. When Roth published the second edition in 1956, western civilization and the Jews had, it seemed, been resurrected from the dead.

Western civilization was in the midst of the greatest economic and social advance in its history, and the remnants of Jewry had created a Jewish state and were enjoying unprecedented social and political advances in the democratic world. In the decades following the war the west welcomed and even celebrated its Jewish heritage. The alliance seemed to have found a permanent embodiment and entered a honeymoon period.

The decades following the end of World War II are described by some historians as the "golden era of the 20th century."

They were marred by the fear of nuclear war, and are remembered as the time of a cultural banality described in the film Pleasantville. But those were also years when a booming economy lifted everyone.

More important, the cultural, moral and political tendencies of western civilization seemed to have found a final form – the social democratic state. The social democratic state was one that rested on freedom of expression, progressive scientific management and research, and the safety net of the welfare state.

In some countries this was called managerial liberalism, in others, social democracy, but it embodied ideals of freedom, reason (as defined in the sciences) and distributive justice. It was a moral political order that marginalized religious fundamentalism and even political conservatism.

When we think of the millions of people that it educated and that were raised from poverty, it seemed not at all inappropriate for David Ben-Gurion to announce that Israel could be a light unto the nations by bringing social democracy to the third world. Social democracy may not have been the Messiah, but it made certain that when the Messiah came he/she would have a hard act to follow.

The liberal/socialist order that characterized this period was widely praised as a product of what was then called the Judeo-Christian tradition and contrasted starkly with pagan totalitarianism of the Nazis, who had been defeated, and the Stalinists, who dominated large sections the globe.

Judaism, as well as Christianity, was embodied in that world. Jewish and Christian theologians were among the most prominent public intellectuals. Popular culture honored Norman Vincent Peale, the Protestant, Bishop Fulton Sheen, the Catholic, and Rabbi Joshuah Loth Liebman.

The university population honored Reinhold Niebuhr and Martin Buber not only as independent thinkers, but as people who gave the western social order religious class. These thinkers sometimes carped against the shallowness of liberal civilization and its "fleshpots" but rarely joined its enemies. Western civilization was the product of prophets and apostles.

I don't believe that the interplay of Judaism, Christianity and liberal civilization has been studied sufficiently (I tried to steer students into this area). Will Herberg's famous Protestant, Catholic and Jew is one major contribution in this direction.

The Civil Rights Movement of the early '60s drew much Jewish religious support. The prominent theologian Abraham Joshua Heschel was at the side of Martin Luther King Jr. in Washington. It is fascinating that many of the rebels against this world were Jewish literary people and social thinkers. Still for many, Judaism had found a plausible embodiment.

Since the late '60s the liberal socialist ship of state has been driven into strange and stormy waters. Moreover, some of its constituents have become mutineers, some of them strong enough to take power, others bold enough to question the sources of its legitimacy in Judaism.

There is a new cacophony of opinions. Some of the mutineers have directed their critiques against Judaism itself.

Feminism has been the most successful radical movement of the last decades. Feminist scholars have questioned the contribution of the Hebrew Bible to a decent society. They have challenged the Hebrew texts and the Hebrew tradition as the deepest bastion of patriarchy.

One British feminist, a literature scholar, told me that life deteriorated for women in England when the Hebrew Bible was translated into English. Jewish feminists have taken up this challenge, but call for revisions within Judaism.

Another political force, environmentalism, has produced writers who challenge the role of Judaism in founding industrial civilization.

They argue that the book of Genesis introduces a God who is above nature and sanctions our dominion over nature, which has opened the way to the devastation of the planet. Of course environmentally sensitive Judaism has responded to this attack by claiming that Genesis calls for us to be custodians of nature, not rapists.

For many conservative thinkers, these changes resulting as they have in widespread social chaos – the abandonment of the family and sexual hefker (pandemonium) – do not challenge Judaism fundamentally; they simply call for the political order to rededicate its Jewish moral roots.

Society, they argue has de-

Nature of Messianism

scended into Sodom and Gomorrah and it must be redeemed by the Ten Commandments. Would that it were that easy.

Finally, one of the root assumptions noted by Cahill, the assumption of Messianism, has been challenged by thinkers who have concluded that the Holocaust was an enormity that has undermined the possibility of any belief in a meaningful structure of history.

Both conservatives and neoleftists have questioned the nature of Messianism. Conservatives hold that Messianism has been the most destructive force of our century.

This claim, made in the '50s by the famous French author Albert Camus, was argued forcefully by my old teacher George Grant, and is the central contention of the contemporary novel Damascus Gate. In this novel, the land of Israel is depicted as the land that has spawned this most destructive force.

Much of this turmoil is the religious and cultural debris of the twisters of globalization. Thirty and even 100 years ago, anyone could have predicted that the world would become smaller. We all remember that Marshall McLuhan announced the coming of the global village.

But today's globalization is still strange. It makes us more dependent and connects us to the world. But also, by some weird configuration, it creates tribes and ethnic worlds that try to make themselves windowless.

It is a world that has spawned religious fundamentalism, where the orthodox of any faith can spend the day designing Web sites and the evening associating only with their own.

Today, it is possible to disassociate Judaism from liberalism or any of its universalism, and there are many calls (not only from the Orthodox) to draw in the fences.

Globalization offers us the possibility of keeping in our own cocoons, or, if we step out, we step into a world in which we jostle with other religions and other systems of ethics. Thus, in universities we find disputes from orthodox religious groups (not only Jewish) who want worlds of their own, and those who want to jostle with others.

All of this gives Judaism and political theory an agenda. I am not a theologian and will not offer Jewish solutions to these disputes. What I wish to suggest is that we have entered an era in which the basic questions of political philosophy – the question of the role of the state, the role of religion within the state, the role of liberty, the priority of justice and the meaning of history – have been reopened.

Such questions preoccupy the western world and they preoccupy the Jewish world. But today there is a Jewish state, and the questions that have emerged for us in Diaspora as cultural and philosophical questions, have emerged for Israel as urgent political ones.

We used to revel in the fact that after 2,000 years we now have Jewish prostitutes and Jewish policemen. Let us hope that we also have Jewish political thinkers, because much of the future relationship between Judaism and political thought will be played out in that land where the issue of the priority of justice was raised between prophets and kings.

Louis Greenspan teaches in the faculty of political science at McMaster University in Hamilton, Ont.

A treasure and an invitation

By CHERYL JAFFEE

Jacob Lowy was a man of action. Over a period of 50 years, he transformed his great passion for Judaism and Jewish learning into a richly textured library of Hebraic and Judaic books.

In 1977, he turned his passion for his country into a gift, with the donation of his treasured library to the people of Canada. The shared heritage which moved him so was human intellectual creativity at its most universal and eternal.

The Jacob M. Lowy Collection of Rare Hebraic and Judaic Texts is housed within the Lowy Room at the National Library of Canada, in Ottawa. This serene and beautiful room allows small groups to gather

First look at antiquity

Jacob M. Lowy

around a large wooden table, to see up close what the paper, typography and bindings of centuries-old books look like.

For some, it is a first look at antiquity and a chance to consider the difference between what is old and what is a facsimile, and why it matters.

For others, it is a first encounter with Hebrew and other Jewish languages, and a place to hear about the historical circumstances under which printers and book owners lived and died. For others still, it is a dramatic reconnection to a heritage. Scholars are humbled by history while actively involved in its study.

The Jacob M. Lowy Collection includes first and early editions of Bibles and biblical commentaries, Talmud and Jewish law, liturgy, mysticism, medieval philosophy, history, philology and more. These books, some 4,000 in total, come from Europe, Asia, Africa and North America. Both Jewish and non-Jewish languages are represented in the collection. Thus there are books in Hebrew, Aramaic, Yiddish and Ladino, as well as in Greek, Latin and other European languages. The earliest books were printed in the 15th century.

Many of the books in the collection bear the markings of the historical periods through which they passed. The black ink of censorship and the arrogant signatures of 16th-century censors contrast with the detailed and careful inscriptions of owners long dead.

The markings of institutions of learning and their students, long-gone, contrast with the stamps on books confiscated by the Nazis.

The sublime and the terrible coexist tranquilly here, as they never could within the course of history. These books are survivors, witnesses to history.

I invite you to visit this treasure and see for yourselves.

Cheryl Jaffee is the curator of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection National Library of Canada, telephone: 613-995-7960; fax: 613-943-1112; or e-mail cheryl.jaffee@nlc-bnc.ca

'The element of stability'

By JACOB M. LOWY

To speak of the Jewish contribution to world civilization is to examine, in essence, the fate of the Jewish people from the vantage point of world history. Indeed, no other individual history has been involved to a greater extent in...the progressive manifestations of western civilization.

The Jewish people participated in all of its decisive phases. It witnessed Egyptian, Babylonian, Greek, Roman, Arabic and European civilizations in their successive hegemonies.

Paradoxically, it was the wandering Jew who constituted the element of stability in the flow of human events. Through time and space, he was the link between peoples, such that his history reflected universal history; his philosophy lent to universal ethics; and his knowledge broadened world science and letters...

Not in every generation, nor in every country, do we find Jews at the forefront...But the great intellectual contributions throughout all the centuries have been interconnected and supported by the highest esteem in which Jews have held scholarship...The solid structure of Jewish life, ethics, morality and above all, love for learning, has kept the wellspring of Jewish knowledge alive even in periods of turmoil and in times of trouble...

A substantial amount of our great Jewish patrimony...is contained in the library I have been privileged to donate to the National Library of Canada, and through it to the people of Canada.

I believe that those who came to Canada were privileged to become Canadians. Here is a lesson: those who welcome the stranger to the gate enrich Canada through our heritage...This library will enable Canada to have a centre of internationally recognized Judaica which scholars of all faiths may use to broaden our understanding of a shared heritage.

Excerpted and edited by Cheryl Jaffee from Jewish Scientific Contributions to World Civilization, an address presented by Jacob M. Lowy at the National Library of Canada in Ottawa, Nov. 19, 1981, on the occasion of the opening of the exhibition, Incunabula, Hebraica & Judaica: Five Centuries of Hebraica and Judaica, Rare Bibles and Hebrew Incunables from the Jacob M. Lowy Collection.

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel underwent radical change

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Will 5759 be remembered as a year of radical change in the course and direction of Israel's history, or merely as a year when the government changed hands after an election and life went on much as it did before?

The answer, as 5760 begins, is that the jury is still out. But if history and Israel's recent election are any guide, the radical change scenario is more likely.

While there have been many different governments in Israel's 50-year history, only three times has there been a change in the party that controls the country. While this is a regular enough event in most parliamentary democracies, in Israel's case, each of these changes ushered in a veritable cataclysm in the domestic and diplomatic directions in which the country was headed.

In 1977, after nearly three decades of uninterrupted rule by the Labor party or its predecessors, Menachem Begin won an election, at last, as the head of the Likud bloc.

Begin's victory signaled not only a sharp turn to the ideological right, but also the emergence of new power blocs. Israel's Sephardi communities, in particular the large Moroccan community, were solidly identified with Likud.

For them, Begin's success meant they had finally "arrived" after years of alienation and discrimination. Begin, moreover, created what was to be a stable and lasting alliance between his Likud and the Orthodox parties: the National Religious Party (NRP), Agudat Yisrael and later, the Sephardi haredi Shas party. That alliance was the pivotal axis of Israeli political life through the late 1970s and the 1980s.

In foreign affairs, of course, Begin's advent, far from triggering tension and war as the left had feared, brought about the first breakthrough to peace: the Camp David conference and the peace treaty with Egypt.

But the Likud and its allies, determined to perpetuate Israel's rule over the West Bank, held on tenaciously to the Greater Land of Israel.

It took the return to power of the Labor party under Yitzhak Rabin in 1992 for the second great cataclysm in Israel's diplomatic saga: the Oslo accords with the Palestinians.

On the domestic front, Rabin's victory seemed to signal the beginning of a turnabout in the party political configuration too: Shas, by now the largest Orthodox party, entered his coalition alongside the secular Meretz party.

But this marriage of convenience did not last, and in 1996, Benjamin Netanyahu, the head of Likud, regained power for his party and reconstituted the Likud-Orthodox alliance. The Oslo process, which Netanyahu reluctantly embraced, barely flickered under his stewardship. But it was not extinguished.

Does Ehud Barak's impressive electoral victory in May and his creation of a broad government encompassing the left and all the Orthodox parties indicate a further irrevocable surge toward peace and reconciliation between Israel and the Arabs?

And does it mean a historic return to the traditional alliance between Israel's leftist and Orthodox parties, which Begin smashed and which Rabin failed to re-create in a lasting way?

Netanyahu calls Barak's 12 percent margin of victory in the direct election for prime minister a result of moral fatigue, but leftist writers and thinkers are welcoming the less chauvinistic, less militaristic mood that has swept much of secular, Ashkenazi Israeli society and begun to make inroads among the traditional and the Sephardi sectors, too.

Barak's supporters make the point that, unlike Rabin, the present premier rules with a solid "Jewish" majority in the Knesset, and the hard-liners, still fighting against Palestinian statehood, are reduced to less than one-quarter of the parliament.

The prime minister's apparent readiness to cede all of the Golan Heights for peace seems likely to win wide support in the referendum he has promised – if and when Syria accedes to his demands on security and normalization.

If, as Barak has publicly and repeatedly pledged, the next 15 months see historic breakthroughs toward peace both on the Syrian-Lebanese and the Palestinian tracks, then last year's change of government will turn out to have been a real watershed in Israel's century of conflict with its Arab neighbors.

Barak says his aim is to end that conflict once and for all. The method of partial, incremental steps forward seems to him too risky, too slow and too unstable. His most oft-repeated statement in his early sallies in international diplomacy – in the Middle East, in Washington and Moscow, and in key European capitals has been: "I am not Netanyahu. I seriously intend to make peace."

If he can translate his intentions into concrete results, moreover, the authoritative and domineering way he put together his governing coalition will be forgiven, even by those within his own party most deeply hurt and offended by his brushing them aside.

If his peacemaking succeeds, his deliberate deferral of pressing domestic issues, especially religious pluralism, will be accepted, in the light of hindsight, as an act of wisdom and political perspicacity. Indeed, the deferral – while ideological foes like Shas and Meretz co-operate with Barak to bring the peace treaties – may well turn out to be the most salutary approach to these intractable state-religion dilemmas that will to a large extent determine the shape of society in the Jewish state into the next century.

The partnership between ideological opposites over peace will, with luck and leadership, blunt their animosity over the issues that divide them.

The Orthodox parties – Shas, United Torah Judaism and NRP – sitting in coalition with the left, may develop a new sense of respect, or at least of tolerance, for the "secularists." And vice-versa.

The perniciously rigid right-against-left, religious-against-secular parallelogram that furnished the parameters of Israeli politics for a whole generation will have been permanently erased, leaving a more mature and less dogmatic political community, better able to grapple with the state-and-religion disputes that lie ahead.

'Soviet' immigrants changed Israel

By SIMON GRIVER
WZPS

When Natan Sharansky arrived in Israel in 1986, he began urging the Israeli people to prepare for the more than one million Jews across the U.S.S.R. who would soon be making their home in the Jewish state.

Out of respect, nobody argued. After all, Sharansky had been in prison for 12 years and was clearly out of touch...

Sharansky's predictions, however, proved accurate. Since 1989, over 800,000 newcomers have reached Israel from the former Soviet Union, representing 16 percent of Israel's Jewish population. In 1990 alone, 185,000 Soviet immigrants arrived in Israel, and in 1991, undeterred by the Gulf War and the Scud missiles raining down on Israel, an additional 172,000 came.

These immigrants have changed the face of the country, contributing to all aspects of the nation from science and high-tech to sports, music, art, culture and politics.

"This wave of aliyah was less Zionist in nature than the Jews who had come in the 1970s," recalled Dr. Baruch Gur, who set up and headed the Jewish Agency's Unit for the Soviet Union in 1989.

"Coming mainly from Russia, the Ukraine and Belarus, they had a strong sense of Jewish identity but did not come here for ideological reasons. They wanted a better economic life and feared the uncertainty, instability and ever-present anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union," Gur said.

Leonid Dubkin, 50, a construction engineer, who arrived in Israel in 1991 from emigrated from Ukraine, because, "the economy of Ukraine was falling apart," he commented, "and anti-Semitism was on the rise. The Jews have always been perceived as guilty for what goes wrong in Ukraine."

Other Jews had more desperate reasons for leaving. Tens of thousands of Jews in southern Belarus and northwest Ukraine lived within a 200-mile radius of the Chernobyl nuclear reactor which had melted down in 1987.

Thousands of Jews with diabetes or other conditions making them dependent on medication, or needing immediate surgery, left because the Soviet health system could not cope with them.

After the collapse of the former Soviet Union (FSU), immigration to Israel increased from the newly independent southern and central Asian republics, which were wracked by wars and civil wars.

Azerbaijan was fighting Armenia, Georgia and Moldova were busy quelling civil unrest, ethnic tensions were rife throughout Uzbekistan, and Tajikistan was being torn apart by Iranian-backed Muslim fundamentalists. Southern Russian states like Dagestan and neighboring Chechnya were also plagued by war.

"We Jews were squeezed out," recalled Robert Tivyair, a Jewish student leader who left Derbent in Dagestan, in the Russian Caucasian Mountains, in 1994 for Israel where he settled in the Negev development town of Ofakim.

"There was never any anti-Semitism," he recalled. "But the local Turkish, Persian and Caucasian ethnic groups were all vying for the power vacuum left by a weak Moscow. We Jews were too small a community. Crime was on the rise too."

A logistical triumph for the Jewish Agency

From 1992 onwards, some 65,000 Jews from the FSU reached Israel each year. In the years 1992 to 1995, half of them came from Azerbaijan, Georgia, Uzbekistan, Tadjikistan and southern Russian republics. Most of these Jews come from ancient Sephardi communities but thousands were Ashkenazi Jews who had fled south and east when the Nazis had invaded the FSU in 1945 and were now being persecuted as European Russian colonialists.

Bringing so many Jews from so many places in such a short time has been a logistical triumph for the Jewish Agency.

"The Israeli government could never have achieved what we did," said Yosef Tropiansky, who became the Jewish Agency's first ever emissary in the FSU when he opened an office in Vilnius, Lithuania in 1989.

"As representatives of world Jewry we were permitted to operate at a time when the Soviet Union was antagonistic to having diplomatic or any relations with Israel," he said.

Tropiansky recollects the climate of fear. Jews would come to his apartment at night rather than risk being seen in broad daylight in his office. But by the following year, the agency offices in Moscow and Leningrad, Kiev, Odessa and Minsk were swamped with would-be Jewish emigres.

Newcomers face unique problems

Today the Jewish Agency has easily the largest overseas presence throughout the FSU and probably the best organized infrastructure. This includes 26 major offices and 450 aliyah co-ordinators in smaller communities. Direct flights regularly bring immigrants to Israel from 22 airports from Vilnius in Lithuania to Kharabovsk in the Russian far east.

Hundreds of ulpanim teach Hebrew to tens of thousands of prospective new immigrants, while a network of Jewish youth clubs and summer camps bring Judaism and Zionism to a new generation of highly assimilated Russian speaking Jews.

In Israel itself, the 800,000 newcomers have had their teething problems. The Law of Return requires immigrants to have only one Jewish grandparent and thousands of the highly assimilated newcomers are not halachically Jewish.

Hundreds of ulpanim teach Hebrew

Tensions between Russian speaking newcomers and veteran oriental Jewish groups have grabbed the headlines, especially during election campaigns when "ethnic interest" parties like Shas (Sephardi) and Yisrael b'Aliyah (Russian speaking newcomers) use inflammatory rhetoric. Fortunately, the tensions very rarely go beyond the verbal.

Unemployment stands at about 12 percent among new immigrants compared to 8.8 percent in the population at large; this despite the fact that new immigrants are actually better qualified on average than Israelis, and indeed the populations of most western countries. Some 2.5 percent of Russian speaking newcomers have doctorates, compared to 1.2 percent of the Israeli population at large.

"These new immigrants have impressive technological know-how," stressed Dr. Orna Berry, chief scientist of the Ministry of Industry and Trade.

"But they have little understanding of the Israeli scene and western commercial environment. So [we] offer them a sheltered place to develop new ideas. Their knowledge and strength in new materials and innovative industrial processes have helped the country diversify its traditional strengths in such sectors as software, telecommunications, medical equipment and biotechnology."

Several new Russian immigrants helped the Dead Sea Works develop a process for extracting magnesium metal from the Dead Sea. Last year Dead Sea Magnesium, a partnership between Dead Sea Works and the German car manufacturer Volkswagen, cast 25,000 tons of magnesium metal for use in the automotive and aerospace industries.

Michael Katz, who reached Israel in 1992 from Moscow, set up Ceramight near Dimona in the Negev. The company has developed ceramic composites with high thermal resistance. Now based in Rehovot, Ceramight has contracts with the US corporation Pratt & Whitney and has attracted investments from venture capital funds.

"We always wanted to leave Russia," said Katz. "But I was involved in highly sensitive military projects and would never have been permitted to go. But when the Soviet Union fell apart we took immediate advantage of the situation."

Other high-tech companies successfully established by new immigrants include: ELAM Electroluminescent Industries Ltd., which has developed luminescent wires in seven basic colors; Sizary Ltd., which specializes in thermal processing systems for reducing metallic contamination during semiconductor wafer production; Acktar Ltd., which has developed an advanced vacuum fabrication process; Newthan Ltd., which offers a highly innovative gauge for measuring vacuums; Servologic Ltd. has developed ADD (Astatic Discrete Drive) technology for motors.

New immigrants have excelled in other areas of endeavor too. In sports, Danny (Yevgeny) Krasnov, who reached the pole vaulting final of both the Barcelona (1992) and Atlanta (1996) Olympics, is the only male Israeli athlete ever to reach a track and field final.

Gotcha Tzitzashvili, 26, and Henry Papiashvili, 19, who made aliyah in 1993 and 1996, respectively, from Tblisi, Georgia, have put Israel on the Greco-Roman wrestling map.

Tzitzashvili, who is related to Papiashvili by marriage, finished fifth in the under 76 kilogram division in Greco-Roman wrestling in the 1996 Atlanta Olympics, while Papiashvili won the world championships in the under 67 kilogram division in Cairo, Egypt in 1998.

This was the first time that the Israeli flag had ever flown above the winners' podium and the Hatikvah played at a sporting event in an Arab country.

Jewish N.Y. dream is now a reality

By RUTH HEIGES
WZPS

One day in 1909, 66 Jewish families living in Jaffa decided they would leave the comfort and security of their middle class lives to build a new neighborhood on the sands, a few kilometres north of the 4,000-year-old city.

Remarkably, there are no records documenting how or why the decision was taken, nor who initiated it. Perhaps it was not much different from the concept that has come to known as suburbanization.

In fact, the text of the promotional brochure for building Achuzat Bayit, as the neighborhood was named, supports this supposition:

"We must occupy a decent stretch of land on which to build ourselves houses. It should be situated near Jaffa, and will constitute the first Hebrew town, which will be 100 percent Jewish populated, where Hebrew will be spoken, and purity and cleanliness maintained; and we shall not walk in the ways of the nations, and just as the town of New York symbolizes the gateway to America, so must we improve our town, until someday it becomes the New York of Eretz Yisrael... In this town, we will set out streets having roads and sidewalks, with electric lighting. Entering into every house will be water from the wellsprings of salvation that shall flow to us by means of pipes, as in every modern town in Europe, and also canalization will be arranged for the health of the town and its inhabitants." Tel Aviv – The Dynamics of a Dream, by Ilan Shchori.

Clearly, many bought into the idea and the project, which was renamed Tel Aviv, began in 1909. This first neighborhood mushroomed, and for decades to come, Tel Aviv was in a great rush to be built – eyes focused on the new and back turned to the old. Within 15 years, it had grown into a full-fledged town and by 1939 its population totalled 160,000.

Now, 90 years after the Jewish residents of Jaffa were exhorted to the concept of "New York on the Mediterranean," it can be said that the vision of the founders has been fulfilled. Though considerably smaller than other world metropolises (400,000 residents, with over one million in the greater area), the first "Hebrew city" is, indeed, the cultural, financial and commercial heart of Israel.

In fact, it is considered so dynamic by international standards that Newsweek magazine recently cited it as being one of only three "hot new tech cities" outside the United States (the other two being Cambridge, England, and Bangalore, India): "And some say that the Silicon Valley's most serious global competitor is the mini-sprawl around Tel Aviv. 'High-tech start-ups are the new Zionism,' says Yossi Sela, head of a $150 US million venture-capital fund in the suburb of Herzliya."

One of the factors in this, is that Tel Aviv is one of the top 10 cities in the world to which young people migrate according to the magazine: "Tel Aviv, the country's most expensive city, has become the whirring centre of high-tech growth almost by default – it is the only Israeli metropolis that operates on the same 24-hour schedule as the high-tech industry."

In 90 short years, Tel Aviv has grown, burgeoning to the point that the Jaffa from which it originated is now incorporated into the city. What is important, however, is that it has come of age, embracing the new, while no longer neglecting the old.

Tel Aviv has come of age

One of the residents of the Neve Zedek neighborhood, denouncing the opening of the "cinematograph," as the first movie theatre was known, wrote: "It will be most harmful to us, also in a material sense, because thieves will find the right answer, for they will find a man lying in wait at the threshold of his house, saying, 'To the cinematograph I go.'

"And if I am wrong, no matter, and also in a moral sense, for who will guarantee that women and virgins shall not be taken by surprise, and you know how the common people are." (Tel Aviv — The Dynamics of a Dream)

What might this venerable citizen have thought of the fact that one of the first events kicking off the 90th anniversary celebrations was an open-air concert by American hip-hop singer, Coolio.

Many of the other anniversary celebrations, however, would have seemed wholly appropriate to the Tel Avivians of yesteryear, culminating in early spring with the traditional Ad-lo-yadah Purim parade. If they were attending the 10th anniversary celebration of the Suzanne Dellal Centre for Dance in Neve Zedek on Sept. 23, for example, if anything looked different to them, it would be the way the buildings of this first quarter have been made beautiful.

Renewal of Jaffa next on agenda

Similarly, the celebration of cafe culture to be held on Bialik Street during the first week of October – which will also celebrate the history of the city – might cause them to remark at how well the buildings have withstood the years.

On the other hand, if they were to search for the venerable Gymnasia Herzliya High School, they would likely be overwhelmed and perplexed by the sky-scraping Shalom Tower that stands in its place. The only vestige of the Gymnasia's existence is in photographs and artwork, as the building was torn down without a thought to preservation.

Today, it is this very point which marks Tel Aviv's new maturity. For the effort which shines so brightly in Neve Zedek and Bialik Street, and is peppered throughout the older part of the city, is the preservation and renovation of these original buildings.

For aficionados of the Bauhaus, eclectic and international styles of architecture which flourished in Europe prior to World War II, Tel Aviv is an outdoor museum. Architecture was one of the rich elements cultivated here by Jews who immigrated from Germany, along with such institutions as the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra and the Eretz Yisrael (Ha'aretz) Museum, which they established.

They were influential in promulgating the minimalist, functional architectural style inspired by the works of Le Corbusier and Erich Mendelsohn, which also suited the socialistic influence in pre-State Tel Aviv. At the same time, they unwittingly created an ironic legacy, for the destruction Germany brought upon itself with the world war included its examples of the Bauhaus School of Art and Design, leaving Tel Aviv, the first Hebrew city, to be the site of its preservation.

Currently, about 100 buildings are marked for historic conservation. The pace-setter for these preservation efforts has been the Tel Aviv Foundation, which established a worthy standard via its renovation of the defunct high schools which now comprise the Suzanne Dellal Centre. The availability of public funding is extremely limited, however, and much of the success will depend extensively on private initiative and responsibility. This is, in fact, happening, with Neve Zedek currently undergoing extensive gentrification, as a result.

Beautiful examples of how successfully this can be accomplished can also be viewed in the area between Rothschild Boulevard and Montefiore Street, where financial companies and institutions, architectural firms and law firms have rehabilitated some of the special buildings, breathing new life into them.

In addition, developers are being permitted to undertake new construction on the sites of properties which are beyond repair, if they are willing to undertake restoring at least the original facade, and in some cases, even more. Several examples of this approach can be seen on Rothschild Boulevard, where office towers are being developed which incorporate or preserve the original structures.

By the time Tel Aviv-Jaffa celebrates its first century, it is hoped that much of this preservation work will have been accomplished, and the renewal of Jaffa, for which a master plan has been approved, will begin.

The honey bee is really a busy bee

By SHARON KANON
WZPS

Did you ever think how many bees worked to produce a 100-gram jar of honey and how much time it took them?

Thinking about the demand for honey on Rosh Hashanah, when every traditional Jewish family dips apples and bread in honey and makes a special blessing for a sweet year, I decided to visit the Lin Bee Farm in Moshav Bilu near Rehovot, the largest family bee farm in Israel, to get some answers to my question.

Bees deserve more credit than merely that of supporting cast in the honey story. Foraging bees suck nectar from flower blossoms, and carry it in a honey sac (an expandable part of the esophagus) back to the hive. Nonforaging bees in the hive convert it to honey by manipulating the nectar on their tongue, adding enzymes to invert sucrose sugar to fructose and glucose and removing excess water.

"The number of bees in a colony varies with the availability of blossoms," says Netta Lin Cohen, marketing manager of the Lin Bee Farm. "When the queen bee gets a report via a bee dance that flowers outside are plentiful, she lays more eggs to increase the team of workers. We add a third floor to the hive for them."

Bees forage either for pollen grains in the male portion (stamen) of flowers, or for nectar. Pollen is packed into pellets and carried on their hind legs back to the hive. In Israel, during an orange blossom season with plenty of rain, a hive with 50,000 to 80,000 bees can produce 30 to 40 kilograms of honey in two to three weeks.

"Every bee goes in and out of the hive 20 to 50 times a day," says Cohen's brother Yuval Lin, who has primary responsibility for the family's 1,000 hives. "That's 50 to 80 million bees," he estimates.

And what about the amount of bee power needed to make a jar of honey? "One thousand bee days are needed to make 100 grams of honey," he observes.

Lin has been fascinated by bees since the age of 14, after his father brought home some hives. He kept his small-scale apiary going while serving in the Israeli air force and during college studies. It is now an enterprising family business.

Cohen, an architect who studied at Bezalel and the Technion, took over the job of marketing director when her father, Uriel, became ill and died two years ago. A manager in Koor Industries, he was the creative force behind the development of the bee farm, and the visitors' centre, where more than 20,000 people visit each year.

"I like being out in nature, working with the bees," says Lin who, like other Israeli beekeepers, moves his hives around the country to take advantage of blossoming plants and trees in different areas. Sometimes, he moves the hives to the sunflower fields in the Negev, to the flowering watermelon, cucumber and pepper plants in the Arava or to the Golan when apple and cherry trees bloom.

"Bees are needed for pollination," Lin says. "You can import honey but you can't import pollination," which is another source of income for the beekeeper.

"I look for the best conditions

Honey was used for medical problems

for the hives – not just the right food or the right place, but the right position in that place," he says.

Between 50,000 and 80,000 bees packed closely in a hive are able to avoid most illnesses because of the antibiotic and other medicinal benefits of honey, propolis (a glue-like by-product of the honey-making process) and pollen. "But I can tell from the bees' smell and appearance, and from the noise they make, if they are well or if they are ill," says Lin.

Honey has been used for treating burns and lacerations since ancient times, and the Rambam was known to mix honey with various substances to treat medical problems.

In fact, honey was the main source of sugar in those days. When the Bible refers to the "land flowing with milk and honey," it uses the same Hebrew word, dvash, used today to refer to the sweet produce of the fruits of the land – a thick syrup from dates or grapes.

Manna, eaten by the Israelites during their 40 years in the desert, tasted like honey cakes, according to the Bible.

Wild bees' honey was also available in Samson's day. He and his parents fressed on it and it was the answer to his famous riddle: "Out of the eater came something to eat, out of the strong came something sweet," the answer wheedled out of him by his Philistine wife's question: "What is sweeter than honey, and what is stronger than a lion?"

The Lin Bee Farm offers a wide variety of bee products – honey with nuts, sesame, eucalyptus, almonds and ginger. As well, they offer a whole line of healing and health-enhancing products such as fresh royal jelly, with either propolis, ginseng or pollen.

Three new Lin products this year are aimed at preventing the flu and winter viruses: pollen powder, honey, royal jelly and vitamin C in one combination; a potent syrup with propolis, cat's claw, vitamin C, honey, black sambuck and astrologus to bolster the immune system (better than a flu shot that only inhibits one kind of flu); and honey, royal jelly and vitamin C for basic well-being.

Research indicates that honey is good for the liver and the heart, reduces high blood pressure and aids general circulation. Royal jelly, the exclusive food of the queen bee, is a rich source of B-complex vitamins, as well as vitamins A, C, D and E, biotin and folic acid. It is also the single richest source of natural pantothenic acid, a stress reducer, and acetycholine, the key to brain and nerve development and memory. It also has gamma globulin, natural antibiotics and gelatin to prevent aging of the skin.

When you sit down for your Rosh Hashanah meal this year and see the honey on the table, consider the bees who worked so hard to enable us to enjoy not only a sweet New Year, but a healthy one too.

More than million Jews still left in the FSU

Anna Smashnova is a leading young female tennis player who has won several major WTA tournaments and is ranked 38 in the world.

The 22 year-old came to Israel with her parents from Minsk in Belarus in 1990.

In the arts, Israel has a Russian new immgrant theatre group – Gesher – performing in Hebrew, Russian and English, while the country's orchestras have dozens of new immigrant musicians.

In politics, Mikhael Nudelman, who reached Israel in 1991, was elected deputy mayor of Kiryat Shmonah on an independent ticket in 1993 and entered the Knesset in 1996 representing the Yisrael b'Aliyah party.

While immigration to Israel is open to all who have one Jewish grandparent, including large numbers of the elderly and sick, the Jewish Agency has actively "marketed" aliyah among stronger sectors of the Jewish population in Russian speaking countries. The Sela, Rom and Youth Aliyah's Naaleh 16 program have brought young academically oriented students. Through Aliyah 2000, immigrants are recruited for jobs and college courses while still in the FSU.

After 10 years of aliyah, there are still more than a million Jews left in the FSU. Statistics show that immigration is on the rise again following the financial crisis last year in Russia and rising anti-Semitism, which according to Amos Lahat, director of the Jewish Agency's department for the FSU, will result in 60,000 immigrants arriving in Israel this year compared to 52,000 last year.

Aqueduct unique in Israel

By DANIELLA ASHKENAZY
WZPS

The old road leading to the new Alona Park near Binyamina meanders its way between peach groves and vineyards. Turning northeastwards, one reaches the Menashe foothills and Moshav Aviel – one of three small remote farming communities situated in the heart of the 34,000-dunam park (a little less than 34,000 acres).

Dedicated in June '99, Alona Park is already beginning to offer hiking trails, camping grounds and other wide-ranging nature facilities to its numerous visitors. But its main attraction is neither the 20,000 dunams of natural woodlands, nor the area's indigenous oaks (alon in Hebrew, for which the park is named), a now somewhat rare species that in biblical times covered much of the coastal plain. Rather, it is a subterranean aqueduct – the only one of its kind or size in Israel.

Alona has a six kilometre underground passage, part of an ancient Roman water system which for 1,860 years fed Caesarea which in Roman and Byzantine times had been the provincial capital of Judea. Chiseled out of the relatively soft limestone hillside by hand, the aqueduct was no mean engineering feat for its day.

Though one must crawl through some sections of the channel, and enter others by rope ladder, Alona Park's calling card is a 300-metre underground stretch where the ceiling is almost two metres high. This section is now under joint development by the Jewish National Fund (JNF), the Alona Regional Council and the Government Tourist Authority, in order to provide easy access for visitors.

"Two aqueducts served Caesarea," explains JNF archeologist Eli Shenhav. The older one, running parallel to the coast, was the city's main source, diverting water from the mouth of the Taninim Stream to the north.

The other, a larger, more complex 24-km channel, parallels the first for several kilometres, then veers to the right and cuts across the coastal plain to Shuni.

Shuni, once a spring-fed Roman "health spa and recreation resort" 5 km to the east, boasted both an amphitheatre and an Olympic-size swimming pool. Restored by JNF in 1986, Shuni is now a well developed park commemorating Zionist leader Ze'ev Jabotinsky. The park was used by his followers as an operations base in the 1940s and as a site for establishing settlements in the 1950s.

"The 6-km subterranean stretch, which is the last leg of the 24-km aqueduct, is actually a smaller auxiliary channel that extended the eastern aqueduct along five natural springs through the Menashe Hills, while also conducting water originating in the upper channel of Nahal Taninim," says Shenhav.

"It was apparently constructed to provide supplementary water as the needs of the city increased, or to provide for drought years."

The aqueduct was first mentioned in the 1882 landmark Survey of Western Palestine by C.R. Condor and H.H. Kitchener.

Only in the 1950s, however, were the first four closely spaced, blocked entrance shafts to the underground section uncovered, by the Mekorot Water Company which was constructing an open, concrete canal to divert Nahal Taninim waters to the coastal aquifer instead of losing them to the Mediterranean.

Over the years, occasional hikers armed with ropes and flashlights have visited the site. But development for commercial tourism was initiated only recently.

Before the site was ever chosen, according to Alona Regional Council head Eli Azulai, parts of the neglected and at times treacherous, water-filled channel had been explored by an elite navy team who pinpointed the shaft locations from the inside.

Shenhav recounts that in the early 1990s, under the watchful eye of now-retired Israel Antiquities Authority archeologist Azriel Ziegelman, tons of mud, rocks, unsavory debris and hard calcified limestone sediment that had reached halfway up the two-metre-high channel began to be removed, shovelful by shovelful, chip by chip.

For the past few summers young volunteer diggers from JNF, as well as professional teams equipped with pumps and working under JNF's northern land reclamation division, have thoroughly cleaned out a section of the passage.

"To remain functional," Shenhav points out, "aqueducts require constant care." In Roman and Byzantine times, maintenance involved shoring up weak points and removing sediment and debris that impeded flow." Inscriptions found on the walls of the Caesarian aqueducts give the identity of the Roman maintenance crews – each, a specific legion dating back to Hadrian.

Shenhav says that during the period that followed, when for 500 years the area was under Muslim rule, there was an influx of Bedouin tribes unaccustomed to permanent settlement. This, together with the arrival of an unsophisticated peasantry, changed the face of the country, he says. "Caesarea, once a large city and important centre sustained by water from the aqueducts, reverted back to a small village."

To date, the three parties involved in the project have invested $1.25 million for clearing, planning and development of the 10-dunam area, which will comprise seven shafts, walkways, staircases, shady rest areas and rest rooms.

Artificial lighting will also be needed, adds Shenhav. In former times, wall niches, which are still visible today, were used for oil lamps by those who built or worked on the aqueduct."

Archeologist Azulai, a native of the area, explains that without pumps, the passage would be totally flooded in winter by rushing water, fed by the rain.

Even in the driest month of August, one can get a taste for time past, walking mid-calf to knee-deep in cool waters that for 2,000 years have flowed from the same headwater source at Nahal Soharin, which is located 24 km northeast of Caesarea.

The finishing touches, including landscaping, were recently put on the 10-dunam section of the park, and visitors can now roll up their pants and wade through history along a 300-metre section of the metre-wide underground passage.

Numerous Israeli songs have been written about trees. Now, it seems, it is time for the trees to repay the debt.

Some 50 trees were planted in June '99 at a new Israel Songs Grove in Alona Park near Binyamina, each named for 50 songs chosen by the public in a special hit parade of favorites spanning the 51 years of statehood.

The idea for the Jubilee Songs Grove, which is to be part of a larger Israel Songs Forest, was the brainchild of Eitan Gafni, who headed the Jubilee Songs committee. The woodland is to house an artists' colony, songwriters' workshops, recording studio, rehearsal rooms and outdoor events theatre. According to Gafni, "Artists will be able to draw inspiration from the country's trees and landscapes."

Among the 50 songwriters, composers and performers – each planted a tree – were songwriters Ehud Manor, Shuli Natan of Jerusalem of Gold fame – it topped the list of favorites – Kobi Oshrat, Shimrit Or and Yaacov Hollander; poet Nathan Yonatan, and singers Shmulik Kraus and Uzi Hitman.

Also present were JNF chair Shlomo Gravetz; Alona Regional Council head Eli Azulai and the director of Israel Radio's Third Station (Reshet Gimmel), Amnon Shiloni. Gravetz and Manor, both natives of Binyamina, shared a tree planting.

... AND THAT IS?
WE SHOULD GET OUT OF THE 20TH CENTURY
... AS SOON AS POSSIBLE!
EHUD BARAK WON A LANDSLIDE VICTORY
BECAUSE HE PROMISED TO BRING US TOGETHER
SO NOW WE'RE TRYING TO TELL HIM WHO TO KEEP OUT!

OH... AND ANOTHER THING...
LOCAL COMPANIES ARE DENYING THAT USING CELLULAR PHONES CAN CAUSE MEMORY LOSS!
PRESIDENT CLINTON HAS PROMISED TO SEND AN ISRAELI INTO OUTER SPACE!
WOW!
ONLY ONE?
SOME OF US BELIEVE THAT ARAFAT CAN NOT STOP PALESTINIAN RIOTING!
AND SOME OF US BELIEVE THAT ARAFAT TOTALLY CONTROLS THEM!
THE QUESTION IS...
WHICH OF US ARE THE OPTIMISTS?
AN ISRAELI CENTRIST POLITICAL PARTY...
HAS ONE SERIOUS PROBLEM TO FACE.
WE ISRAELI VOTERS ARE MODERATELY EXTREME
...BUT NOT EXTREMELY MODERATE.

WE'VE BLENDED THE DEFECTS OF COALITION GOVERNMENT
...WITH THE DRAWBACKS OF A PRESIDENTIAL STRUCTURE!
OUR NEW ELECTORAL SYSTEM IS BIZARRE AND UNIQUE!
IT'S THE POLITICAL EQUIVALENT OF GENETICALLY ALTERED FOOD!
IN ONE YEAR THE REGION LOST TWO OF ITS WISE MEN.
HUSSEIN OF JORDAN AND NOW HASSAN OF MOROCCO!
AND IN THIS PART OF THE WORLD...
SIGH
WISE MEN ARE IN SHORT SUPPLY!
THERE ARE COUNTRIES IN WHICH THE INDIVIDUAL VOTER...
DOES NOT FEEL THAT THE WEIGHT OF HIS NATION'S FUTURE IS RIDING ON...
HIS OR HER ABILITY TO MAKE THE CORRECT ELECTORAL CHOICE.
UNFORTUNATELY ISRAEL IS NOT ONE OF THOSE COUNTRIES!
THE ELECTION IS STILL MORE THAN FOUR MONTHS FROM NOW...
AND WE'RE ALREADY BEING FLOODED WITH PROPAGANDA!
IT'S LIKE THE HANUKKA JELLY DONUTS
THEY TRY TO SELL 'EM TO US EARLIER AND EARLIER EACH YEAR!!
THE ISRAELI ELECTIONS WILL BE ON MAY 17TH?!! ...YOW!!
IF I DECLARE A STATE ON MAY 4TH I'LL GET BIBI RE-ELECTED...
BUT IF I DON'T DECLARE A STATE ON MAY 4TH IT'LL LOOK LIKE I GAVE IN TO THEM!
I HATE IT WHEN THEY DO SOMETHING RIGHT!
WELL, THEY REALLY TURNED UP THE HEAT ON US!
YOU'RE TALKING ABOUT THE BEZEQ WORKERS, THE ARKEDI VERDICT, THE TEACHER'S SANCTIONS...
...THE EU POSITION ON JERUSALEM, OR THE JORDANIAN RESPONSE TO OUR WATER POLICY?
ACTUALLY I WAS TALKING ABOUT THE WEATHER.
OUR SAGES TEACH US THAT LONG AGO WE LOST OUR PRECIOUS AND HOLY TEMPLE
BECAUSE OF THE PREACHING OF HATRED AND DIVISIVENESS.
SO FEEL FREE TO ATTACK THE @#$%! REFORM JEWS! HARASS THEM! &INSULT THEM!!
'CAUSE WE DON'T HAVE A TEMPLE TO LOSE THESE DAYS!
PESSIMISTS HAVE ALWAYS SAID THAT AFTER PEACE WITH THE ARAB WORLD
WE'D HAVE A VICIOUS "KULTURKAMPF" BETWEEN OUR SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS JEWS
WELL WE PROVED THOSE PESSIMISTS WRONG!
WE'RE NOT WAITING FOR PEACE WITH THE ARAB WORLD!

דער היסטאָרישער סיכסוך וועגן כל-נדרי

פון דר. פרעד ווייַנבערג

יום־כּיפּור, דער טאָג פון זינד־פאַרגעבונג, דער הייליקסטער טאָג אין יידישן קאַלענדאַר, הויבט זיך אָן מיטן גוט־באַקאַנטן פול מיט עקסטאַזיגן פון דער כל־נדרי תפלה. פונדעסטוועגן האָבן פיל חכמים אויסגעדריקט זייער נעגאַטיוו מינונג קעגן דעם כל־נדרי געבעט און האָבן זיך קעגנגעשטעלט קעגן אריינעמען כל־נדרי אין יום־כּיפּורדיקן נוסח. רב עמרם גאון, פאַרפאַסער פונעם אַלטן סידור אין יאָר 845 (דהר"ו 4606), האָט זיך אויסגעדריקט, אַז רעציטירן כל־נדרי איז א „נאָרישער מנהג".

פיל למדנים אין מיטלאַלטער האָבן אויך פראָטעסטירט קעגן כל־נדרי ווֶגן און האָבן רעקאָמענדירט, אַז מ'זאָל איגנאָרירן אַפשאַפן פון יום־כּיפּור סדר התפלות דאָס כל־נדרי געבעט.

דער ערשטער פאַרמאַך פון דער תפלה האָט געווּנדן בסל צו מאַכן די נדרים פון לעצטן יום־כּיפּור ביזן היינטיקן. די רבנים האָבן געפילט, אַז ס'איז אוממעגלעך אויפצומאַכן אַ נדר, וואָס מען האָט עובר געווען אין דער פאַרגאַנגענהייט, אַז מ'קען נישט בטל מאַכן אַ נדר אַדער אַ שבועה בדיעבד ד.ה. קריקווירדיק.

מיר קענען זיך פאָרשטעלן, אַז די „נייַ קריסטן" זיינען זיך צוזאַמען געקומען ערב יום־כּיפּור, אין הייליקסטן טאָג פון יידישן יאָר, כדי צו זיין פאַרבונדן מיט זייער גאָט און רעליגיע. זיי האָבן זיכער געפילט, אַז פאַרַ דאַווענען מחון זיי מוזטן זיין און פון זיך אָפּווארפן די נדרים און שבועות, וואָס זיי האָבן אויסגעדריקט צום קריסטלעכן גאָט אין דער קירכע.

אַזוי איז צושטאַנד געקומען די צערעמאָניע פון האַלטן הויך די ספר תורה פאָרן אָפענעם ארון קודש, און דער חזן רעציטירט כל־נדרי, כדי צו באַפרייַען די מתפללים פון אַלע שבועות אין צוקונפט, וואָס זיי האָבן געמאַכט פון פריערדיקן יום־כּיפּור ביזן היינטיקן.

וועו די ויזיגאָטן־אונטערדריקערס האָבן פאַרלוירן זייער הערשאַפט איבער שפּאַניע, איז די נרונט־סיבה פון דער כל־נדרי תפלה פארשוואונדן. דערפאַר האָבן שפּאַנישע רבנים געהאַלטן, אַז כל־נדרי איז מער נישט פּא־סיק אין אַ צייט פון פאַליטישער זיכערקייט. אויך איז ויכטיק צו באַמערקן, אז יאָרן־לאַנג האָבן קריסטן אויסגענוצט די כל־נדרי תפלה צו פּרידיקן, אַז מען קען נישט האָבן קיין צוטרוי צו יידישע שבועות.

די פאַלשע אויסטיישונג מיט איר אַנטיסעמיטישער כוונה, האָט גורם געווען צו פארשפּרייטן דעם בלבול, אַז צו שבועות און נדרים פון יידן קען מען נישט האָבן קיין צוטרוי.

יידישע פידער האָבן זיך געמיט קלאָר צו מאַכן פאַר דער וועלט, אַז די כל־נדרי נדרים זיינען בלויז צווישן מענטשן און גאָט און נישט בין אָדם לחברו, דאָס הייסט צווישן מענטש און מענטש. די יידן־האַסער האָבן אויך אין מיטלאַלטער נשמאַכט אַ גרויסע און אייגנעפירט דאָס „מארע ידעאויקא", אַ באַוונדערע שבועה אין גערייכט נאָר פאַר יידן.

באַמערקונגען וועגן דער נשמה־דירנדיקער מעלאָדיע פון כל־נדרי — אין אַ צוקונפטיקן אַרטיקל.

Changing the way the world communicates...

On the occasion of

Yiskor

it is tradition to make a charitable donation in memory of a loved one or friend.
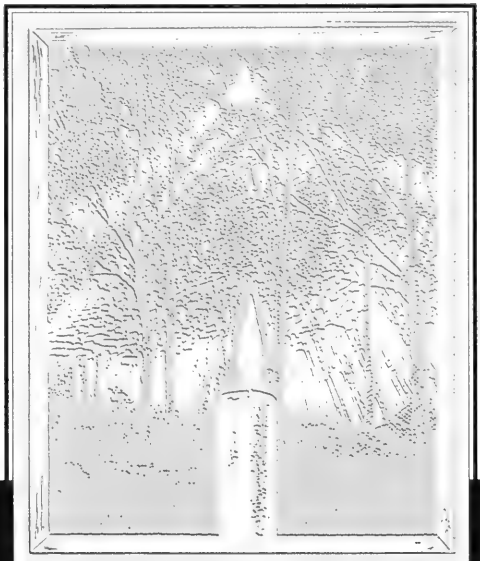
As Yiskor is observed during High Holy Days, it is a time to remember.



יזכור

For they offered charity for the memory of their souls

בעבור שנדבו לצדקה
בעד הזכרת נשמתם

This mitzvah of "tzedekah", translates into action
the promises we make during Yiskor prayers.

"May the words of our mouths become the deeds of our hands."

Let the memory of our loved ones guarantee the future of the Jewish people and all of Israel.

TAILI

How to shop for Parisienne fashion at Bathurst & Lawrence.

TALI fashions is now open.

On Bathurst, just a block or two north of Lawrence Plaza.

And just a few thousand miles west of Paris, France.

COME. STOP BY FOR A VISIT. THE COFFEE'S ON US.

There's never been anything quite like TALI. Right in the heart of the Bathurst community. It's an extraordinary new women's shop featuring some rather exquisite imported Paris fashions. Imported, by the way, by your hosts Tali and René Elhadad. But before we walk you through the fabulous fall lines, why not relax with a coffee from Cravings To Go, two doors up from us. Just mention this ad and we'll cover it.

Naturally, everything at TALI is particularly modest, but these fashion names also carry a cut, cachet, and quality that you simply won't find in run-of-the-mill clothing. And these exclusive lines are available in most sizes and can be tastefully accessorized right in the shop.

QUESTION:
When does ordinary clothing become a work of art?

ANSWER:
When it's made by VOTRE NOM... SURABAYA, and our Canadian designers DEBBIE SHUCHAT and ROSS MAYER.

TALI's fall fashions feature fabulous selections from the very best of Votre Nom, Surabaya, Debbie Shuchat and Ross Mayer. While we're talking fall, let's talk suits and sweaters. It's the right time to embrace the warm cozy feel of sophisticated cashmere, silks, mohair, angora and world-class wool. All to carry you in comfort at work and pamper you through the long glowing evenings. Let us help coordinate your suits and beyond, into the world of creative separates.

BRING IN YOUR JUNIOR FASHION CONSULTANTS

Your kids are welcome here

We know how busy your life can be. We also know you deserve the time to select and properly fit your clothing. Chances are that when you have time to shop, you may also have a youngster or two in your charge. At TALI, you can relax. We'll take care of the kids while you take care of your wardrobe. So come by for coffee and a chat soon. We'd love to meet your family. 3181 Bathurst St. Tel.: (416) 787-7195.

Iraq rebuilding missile sites

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

White House report to Congress

LONDON — Concern that Iraq is rebuilding missile factories that were destroyed in U.S.-led bombing raids is prompting calls for a resumption of weapons inspections by the UN.

The push for renewed inspections – this diplomatic drive is being initiated by the United States and Great Britain – has, in part, come about in response to a secret White House report to Congress that expressed concern about "Iraq's long-established covert procurement activity," the London Sunday Times reported.

The newspaper also said a classified White House report expressed alarm over "activity" at Iraqi sites that are known to be capable of producing weapons of mass destruction.

The paper quoted experts on Iraq's nuclear capability as saying Iraqi President Saddam Hussein could assemble a nuclear warhead within months, although testing it would take much longer.

"It is assumed," said the paper, "that Saddam has taken advantage of the absence of United Nations weapons inspectors he expelled late last year to pursue chemical and biological weapons programs as well."

A security council debate on Iraq is expected later this month, but expectations are low for restoring the UN weapons inspections, as the Security Council, reportedly, is more divided than ever over how to deal with Saddam.

Britain and the United States insist on reinstating the former rigorous weapons-inspection program while continuing to impose sanctions until Saddam complies with UN disarmament demands.

But three fellow permanent members of the Security Council – France, Russia and China – are seeking a relaxation of both the sanctions and the inspection program.

A U.S. proposal for Security Council members to meet this month in Washington and discuss their differences fell through after some countries refused to attend, according to U.S. diplomatic sources.

Pentagon officials are reportedly pressing for an intensification of the air campaign. U.S. and British pilots fired 1,100 missiles at 359 Iraqi targets during the past eight months.

At the same time, some members of Congress support the arming of Saddam's opponents.

Experts believe Iraq will try to acquire enriched plutonium from Russia for use in building nuclear weapons; they have little confidence in the ability of Western intelligence agencies to detect this.

"They [the Iraqis] know how to hide their tracks," David Albright, a former nuclear inspector in Iraq and president of the independent Institute for Science and International Security in Washington, was quoted as saying.

"Russia is a shopper's paradise for them," Albright said.

He believes it is possible that Iraq already has a nuclear weapon design, and that it lacks only the "fissile material" – enriched uranium or plutonium – necessary for building a bomb.

Israel aids Greece

By JEAN COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ATHENS — An Israeli military rescue unit arrived in Athens last Thursday to help rescue people trapped in the rubble of the earthquake.

Israel had offered its services soon after the quake occurred, but was waiting for a green light from the Greek government.

From the time the 73-member team arrived, it became the object of local media attention because of the reputation Israel has earned from previous rescue efforts around the world.

After the announcement that the team was coming, members of the Greek Jewish community contacted Israeli Ambassador Ran Couriel to offer assistance to team members – including opening their homes to the visiting Israelis for Rosh Hashanah.

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Slams Timor Crimes

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress last week condemned crimes against humanity being committed in East Timor. "We are alarmed by the atrocities and appalled that East Timorese in the tens of thousands have been turned into refugees," said CJC president Moshe Ronen. "Canada must press Indonesia to effect an immediate cessation of crimes being perpetrated."

Caplan Meets JIAS

OTTAWA — Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan recently held her first meeting with officials of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS). Foremost of JIAS's concerns is family reunification. The agency is calling on Ottawa to reduce or eliminate barriers to reunifying families. Another item on the agenda was the deportation of failed refugee claimants. JIAS said it hopes the government will make the deportation process more transparent and accountable.

Lord's Prayer Petition

TORONTO — A petition, signed by 97 Ontario municipalities, is asking the government to bring back the Lord's Prayer in public schools. The petition was started by Les Running, a councillor in the township of Front of Leeds and Lansdowne, and a devout Pentecostal. In 1988, Ontario's Court of Appeal ruled that the daily recitation of the prayer in schools violated the Charter of Rights.

Soutine Work On View

HAMILTON — A masterpiece by Lithuanian Jewish painter Chaim Soutine is on permanent display at the McMaster Museum of Art. Portrait of the Painter Richard X is part of a personal collection willed to McMaster University by Dr. Herman Herzog Levy, who died in 1990 and bequeathed to the university over $15 million.

Beth Tikvah Wins Awards

TORONTO — Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue has won the two top awards for programming excellence and outreach in the North American Conservative community. Both are gold Solomon Schechter Awards – one for social action activities and the other for Israel/Masorti programs. Beth Tikvah is the only Canadian synagogue to win two golds.

ISRAEL

Pollard's Petition

JERUSALEM — Convicted spy Jonathan Pollard is petitioning Israel's Supreme Court, demanding that Prime Minister Ehud Barak take steps to secure his freedom. Pollard, who is serving a life sentence for spying for Israel, maintains that Barak has done nothing to seek his release.

Chief Rabbi Resigns

JERUSALEM — The chief rabbi of the Israeli army submitted his resignation this month, ending 23 years in the position. Gen. Gad Navon, 78, cited his age and health as reasons for his decision.

WORLD

Warrant Issued In Bombing

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina's Supreme Court has issued an arrest warrant for Imad Mughniyah for the 1992 bombing of the Israeli embassy here. Mughniyah is a leader of the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement and one of the world's most wanted terrorists. The warrant was issued after authorities gathered what they called "conclusive evidence" that Hezbollah was behind the bombing, which killed 29 people and injured more than 200 others.

Pope's Wartime Record

NEW YORK — The author of a new biography of Pope Pius XII claims the wartime pontiff had a deep-rooted anti-Semitism that led him to refuse to openly condemn the Holocaust. Historian John Cornwell cited secret Vatican records and the Pope's own files to support his conclusions in Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII.

Child Survivors Meet

PRAGUE — Hundreds of child survivors of the Holocaust gathered in Prague to attend their 12th annual conference. There were some 700 attendees at the four days of sessions, some of which were held at the site of the former Theresienstadt ghetto.

Students Protest

SYDNEY — Some 200 students at a Jewish day school here protested this month after the expulsion of 11 students who were suspended until 2001 over incidents involving marijuana. The protesters at Moriah College argue the students need counselling instead of punishment.

Jews Blamed

MOSCOW — A Russian Communist lawmaker accused the "Jewish banking mafia" of money-laundering for Russian organized crime in a scheme involving a U.S. bank. Yuri Ivanov noted the Jewish-sounding names of those who have been linked to an alleged scheme to funnel more than $15 billion out of Russia through the Bank of New York.

Baptists Pray Jews Will Find Jesus

NEW YORK — The High Holy Days are traditionally a time for Jewish soul-searching. But during this year's festivities, a number of evangelical Christians will also be eyeing those souls.

In an effort Jewish leaders describe as "arrogant" and "offensive," an organization claiming to represent almost 16 million Southern Baptists is distributing a new booklet offering suggestions on how to pray that Jews find Jesus.

The booklet offers background information on Jewish culture and urges Baptists to "pray for Jewish individuals you know by name."

"On Rosh Hashanah, when observant Jews around the world begin 10 days of seeking God, Southern Baptists will be praying they find his Son," according to The Baptist Press.

The article quoted a Southern Baptist leader as saying that the effort is "an act of love. Christian intercessors are people of love," he said. "They love the Jewish people, even scattered across the earth as they are, because God first loved the Jewish people."

The group also targets other non-Christians. It published a similar guide to help Christians pray for Muslims during Ramadan, and plans to publish guides for prayer efforts focusing on Hindus and Buddhists.

Colorful parade helps close off popular festival

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — On a Thursday morning a handful of actors gather on the steps of the Minsker Shul on St. Andrew Street located at the crossroads of Kensington Market and Chinatown.

A large 15-foot pale-blue angel puppet rests upright against the main entrance doors of the Minsker. Other similar puppets – they range from 10 to 15 feet in size – with brightly painted papier mâché heads are strewn on the steps. Overhead on the roof a technical crew prepares the special effects for a dramatic piece to be performed on the steps of the shul.

The actors, under the direction of Anne Barber, artistic co-director of Shadowland Theatre, are rehearsing for the third biennial Ashkenaz parade, billed as the largest participatory event of the recent Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

Traditionally the parade, which begins in Bellevue Park in the heart of Kensington Market, always stops at the Minsker shul.

Ashkenaz '99
More on pages 5, 35, 42

Barber has been heading up the Ashkenaz parade since its inception in 1995 (Shadowland Theatre specializes in the highly visual theatre of mask, puppetry and outdoor spectacle).

Meanwhile at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) artists and volunteers are at work in the gym making banners and costumes and adding last minute touches to the gigantic papier mâché Yiddish culture-inspired puppets lining the walls.

Three days later, on an overcast Sunday afternoon, it's showtime. Some 300 people gathered in Bellevue Park– many in costumes and carrying hand-crafted banners – begin to make their way through the narrow, crowded streets of Kensington Market.

Klezmer musicians, which include festival director, trumpeter David Buchbinder, are at the front of the procession. They play a slow, mournful piece.

Huge puppets of a young boy and his grandmother lead the marchers to the Minsker Shul. Behind the scenes, Brad Harley (a co-director of Shadowland) gives some last-minute instructions to the group of actors, and musicians assembled inside. Among them is

A day set apart

Yom Kippur is referred to as the Sabbath of Sabbaths. No other holiday in our religious calendar evokes the emotion and, among some, even the trembling that Yom Kippur does. And it is not for reasons only related to the fast.

The procedures and the rituals for the Day of Atonement are elaborately detailed in the Bible. It was the only day of the year that the Kohen Gadol would enter the Holy of Holies in the Temple.

In Talmudic times, Yom Kippur was also a festive day in Jerusalem when young women and young men presented themselves to each other for possible marriage prospects. Even so, the day has always been set apart from the other holidays.

We all hold onto our own Yom Kippur memories that, at some point during the 26 or so hours of the holiday, are stirred into unique ingredients of the day.

As an additional ingredient to Yom Kippur this year, I offer the following poem by one of the Jewish people's most profound souls.

Meditation Before Kol Nidre

by Abraham Isaac Kook

Take away my shame,
Lift my anxiety,
Absolve me of my sin
And enable me to pray before Thee
With gladness of heart
To pursue Thy Commandments and Thy Torah
In the joy of holiness.
Grant me
To bring happiness to all Thy children,
To exalt and ennoble Thy faithful,
To spread goodness and mercy
And blessing in the world.
Humble the arrogant
Who have tried to pervert me with falsehood
While I sought my happiness in serving Thee.
Save me from weakness
And from faltering
And from every evil trait,
Illumine my eyes
With the light of Thy deliverance.
Help Thy people,
Imbue the heart of Thy people with reverence
And with awe before Thy majesty.
Strengthen them with Thy love,
Guide them to walk in the path of Thy righteousness,
Kindle in their hearts
The light of the holiness of this Day of Holiness
And bring them to possess the inheritance
Thou hast set for them,
Speedily, speedily, in our time, soon.
Amen.

YIDDISH ROOTS CELEBRATED

Hundreds of people turned out for the Ashkenaz Parade, which began in Kensington Market, the hub of the Toronto Jewish community in the early decades of this century. Participants wearing costumes and carrying banners marched and danced to klezmer music as the procession headed down Spadina Avenue to Harbourfront Centre, the main venue of the Ashkenaz Festival.

CPC apologizes for festival 'interruption'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A representative of the Canadian Polish Congress (CPC) has denied any affiliation between the organization, which represents the Canadian Polish community, and a hand-out distributed at two Ashkenaz Festival events.

The eight-page photocopied tract denounces the work of historian Yaffa Eliach, author of There Once Was a World (the story of her hometown, Eishyshok, a Polish shtetl). It also denies Polish complicity in the Holocaust and vilifies Jewish partisans. A note at the end indicates the writing is based on a two-part book published by the Polish Educational Foundation in North America, and available from CPC/Toronto.

Ala Gettlich, CPC's secretary general, told The CJN, "We deeply regret that a festival was interrupted. The CPC doesn't approve of such behavior, nor to our knowledge does it involve any of our members."

The CPC represents an estimated 750,000 to 800,000 people in Canada, of whom almost 200,000 live in the Greater Toronto Area.

Sol Littman, director of the Canadian branch of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, happened to be at Harbourfront's Premiere Dance Theatre for the Sept. 1 reading by Eliach, Yehuda Elberg and Lilian Nattel.

It wasn't until he reached his seat, however, that he realized what he was holding – he assumed the middle-aged man standing quietly near the entrance had handed him a program.

In a letter to Gettlich, Littman said he was saddened by the incident. "You and I are trying to get past the mutual blame and recrimination, to leave behind the history neither of us wrote and move on to a more positive relationship," he wrote. "I guess we still have a lot of work to do."

Gettlich said the CPC has no affiliation with the book's publisher. She also said she found it "troubling" that the incident took place Sept. 1, the anniversary of "the beginning of the Holocaust for the Jewish people." (German forces invaded Poland on Sept. 1, 1939.)

To the best of her knowledge, CPC had not received any requests for the book.

The Sept. 1 incident was the first of two at Ashkenaz. The same person handing out the tracts showed up the next evening at the Urban Square tent for Eliach's talk on Restoring a Vanished Past – Its Life, Time and Humour.

In both cases, an Ashkenaz representative told the audience that the hand-outs had nothing to do with the festival or Harbourfront, said Bruce Rosensweet, executive director of Ashkenaz.

The first night, the intruder left of his own accord; the following night he was escorted off the premises by Harbourfront security and told he would be charged with trespassing if he returned, said Rosensweet.

Canadian Jewish Congress was notified of the incident by a member of the public, said Bernie Farber, executive director of CJC, Ontario region.

While he said the tract was "disturbing," he noted the incident likely involves "one individual who's more interesting in living in the past than forging better relations... I would prefer to concentrate on the positive rather than the negative."

The Canadian Polish Congress was one of the few ethnic organizations to make their presence known at a rally for Iranian Jews early this summer, he noted.

Quartet revives spirit of the Lodz ghetto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The songs of the doomed Lodz ghetto are dead and buried, aren't they?

One would have thought so, since the ghetto was liquidated by the Germans in August 1944, the last in Poland to be destroyed.

But last week, at the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture, the Brave Old World quartet resurrected that musical legacy, if only briefly, with an eclectic selection of Yiddish songs commemorating the Jews of Lodz.

By all accounts, these songs have not been performed since the Holocaust, nor have they been recorded. It was, therefore, a concert to anticipate.

On a bare stage bereft of sets, and without any fancy lighting, Brave Old World launched into a one-hour concert which, for some in the audience, brought back memories of a bitter time.

Surprisingly, perhaps, the songs were not uniformly melancholy. Life in the ghetto was harsh and unforgiving, but it was not without its moments of hope and levity.

Vocalist Michael Alpert began with a plaintive tune about a fiddle, then segued to a cheerful, uplifting song about the joys of Chanukah gelt.

Alpert's subsequent songs, which were ironic, despairing and hopeful by turns, touched on Chaim Rumkowski, the puffed-up leader of the ghetto, and on such enduring themes as hunger, homelessness and death.

Alpert, one of the best traditional Yiddish singers on the scene, lived up to expectations.

His Litvak-accented Yiddish was pristine and soulful, and he did not sound a single false, cloying or maudlin note. He was admirably restrained.

This was, in short, an evening to remember and savor.

Jewish veterans gather to recall fallen comrades

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Some 200 people gathered recently at the cenotaph at Mount Sinai Memorial Park to remember the more than 400 Jewish soldiers who lost their lives during World Wat II, and the many veterans of that war who have died since.

The annual memorial service, which always takes place sometime before Rosh Hashanah, was preceded by the annual Remembrance Parade of Jewish veterans – many in their 70s and older – marching in double file through the cemetery behind a color guard, and a bagpiper and bugler in full military dress.

This annual event, which has taken place at the Canadian Jewish War Veterans' Cenotaph for more than 20 years, was organized by the General Wingate Branch 256, the Royal Canadian Legion.

"For some of us, it's getting tougher and tougher each year [to get here] and every year our ranks are getting thinner," Sam Romberg, president of the Wingate Branch said. "It is of upmost importance to remember these boys. They made this country a country to be proud off.

"That is the importance of this memorial parade. I hope we can continue it for many years to come."

The cenotaph was erected to give family members and friends a place they could come to remember the Jewish soldiers who died during their tour of duty overseas, Murray Jacobs, parade chair, told the assembled group.

He noted that the cenotaph incorporated several symbols – a Maple Leaf for all the Canadian soldiers who served, the Star of David for those Canadians who fought in the 1948 War of Independence – among them are three members of the General Wingate Branch – and a symbol for the partisans who fought in the resistance against the Nazis.

Dignitaries in attendance included Minister of Defence Art Eggleton, MP Jim Peterson, MPPs Monte Kwinter, and Joe Volpe, police board chair Norm Gardner, and Jewish War Veteran Post Commander Hy Shulman.

Rabbi Barry Schneider gave the benediction and Cantor Saul Carr led the singing of the national anthems and chanting of the prayers.

More than 4,500 Canadian Jews served during World War I while approximately some 17,000 Canadian Jews served in the Canadian forces during World War II, Eggleton said.

"Over 400 of them lost their lives, many of them were just teenagers... We owe it to you (veterans) and to those who lost their lives to remember that it was all for peace and human rights."

He said the war in Kosovo was also "fought on the basis of human rights. Human rights is not just a privilege. It's a fundamental right. That's why Canadians fought."

Those perpetrators of ethnic cleansing "must be held accountable," he said.

The service also included the tradition of reading 20 names from the cenotaph which is inscribed with the more than 400 names of the Canadian Jewish soldiers who died during World War II.

Many of the dignitaries present participated in a wreath laying ceremony.

The service included the Mourner's Prayer and Kaddish which was led by the cantor.

The mournful wail of The Last Post and Reveille were sounded by the bugler and the piper played The Lament. RCAF veteran Roy Waisberg blew the shofar.

After the singing of Hatikvah and God Save the Queen the color guard led the veterans and dignitaries to the small building at the entrance of the cemetery, for a reception prepared and organized by the Women's Auxiliary of the General Wingate Branch.

This year, nearly 3,000 of Ethiopia's last remaining Jews from the poverty-ridden Quara region will be "coming home" to Israel. So will an astounding 60,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union, facing waves of anti-Semitism and a dark financial future. Your UJA Federation gift removes Jews from danger. Your support for UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 will ensure the continuation of our rescue efforts and the smooth absorption of immigrants into Israeli life. Together, during this High Holiday period, we're providing Jews in distress with a safer future and renewing Jewish lives.

A rare democracy

On the day after two terrorist bombing attempts failed in Haifa and in Tiberias, the Supreme Court of Israel issued a unanimous ruling prohibiting the use of "physical pressure," commonly understood to be torture, by the Shin Bet in its interrogation methods.

The judges were well aware of the problems their decision would cause for the security forces. They were also aware of the severe criticism the judgment would swiftly evoke in certain quarters. Nevertheless, they chose to set the imperatives of democracy ahead of the imperatives of security.

"We are aware that this ruling does not make it easier to cope with this reality [terrorism]. This is the fate of democracy – which does not consider all means legitimate, and for which not every method used by its enemies is available. Not infrequently, a democracy must fight with one hand tied behind its back. Despite this, democracy has the upper hand, because preservation of the rule of law and recognition of individual liberties are an important component of its concept of security."

The judges paved the way for the Knesset to enact "appropriate" legislation in the matter. Only time will tell if they acted wisely or impractically.

It is, however, a rare democracy whose distinct governing branches can display such compelling acts of principle and courage.

All vows

A great deal of mystery shrouds the origins of Kol Nidrei, the declaration preceding sundown that announces the beginning of Yom Kippur. It dates back at least to the eighth century. Throughout history, it has been used as a sword by some anti-Semites publicly slashing the reputation of Jews as untrustworthy.

But the declaration is a legal proceeding as much as it is a religious, spiritual and emotional one. It is chanted by the chazzan as a binding proclamation before the congregation constituted, during this one late afternoon, as a valid court. Its Ashkenazi melody, like the cello arrangement enshrined in the canon of western music by Max Bruch, is itself a bow pulling tearfully, yet hopefully, across the heart.

To the modern ear, its language sounds strangely arcane. Its core message though, is everlasting: Our honesty, our integrity, stand on our words and our words are proven in our deeds.

Freely translated, Kol Nidrei reads as follows:

"All personal vows, renunciations, promises, obligations, oaths, that we may have made rashly, unwittingly or unknowingly – from this Day of Atonement forward until the next, may we live to see it in peace – we disavow in advance. May we be absolved of them; may we be released from them; may they be null and void and of no effect. May they not be binding upon us. Such vows shall not be considered vows; such renunciations, not renunciations; and such oaths, not oaths.

"And may atonement be granted to the entire congregation of Israel and to the stranger who lives among us, for all of us have been careless.

"Forgive the sins of this people in accordance with Your great mercy, as You have forgiven us since the days of Egypt even to this day.

"As we were told then: And the Lord said, I have forgiven you, as you have sought.

"Blessed art Thou, O Lord, King of the Universe, for granting us life, for sustaining us, and for bringing us to this day."

May our words and our deeds help ensure a divine inscription into the Book of Life.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

"Remember the days of old; understand the experience of older generations."

Punish those who beat up Jewish men

To the Jewish community:

It is with both sadness and anger that I am writing on a matter of utmost importance.

This summer's beating of two elderly men on the steps of a Toronto synagogue is a disgusting example of a hideous form of hate crime. On behalf of my caucus and my party, allow me to express our deeply held belief that such crimes are intolerable.

We have forcefully called upon the attorney general to ensure that hate crimes are prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. Please convey to the members of your organization, and through them to the wider community, my support and sympathy.

The Jewish New Year is approaching. May the celebrations include a renewed commitment from all of us to our tradition of fairness, tolerance and compassion.

Review of Kaddish for my Father overlooked healing

I was pleased to see a review of my book, Kaddish for My Father – New and Selected Poems 1970-1999, by Bill Gladstone in your Aug. 5 issue. It's a mixed review, and Gladstone is entitled to his opinions, even if he sometimes contradicts himself, calling my work both "universal" and "solipsistic."

Gladstone does not refer to the prose piece, Cottage Cheese, in which the speaker and her father come to an emotional, clear peace, and in which she expresses her forgiveness for him, as well as a hope to forgive herself.

While Gladstone discusses the spirituality in the book, he emphasizes a tortured search for redemption, without acknowledging the many moments of peaceful grace and spiritual connection.

There has been a healing. There have been spiritual connections. The book ends hopefully, and spiritually. In a period of trendy literary darkness, Kaddish for My Father is out-of-sync for its optimism, not its bleakness.

Jerusalem mall reflects Israeli diversity

Re: Robert Sarner's article: "Israelis at the mall" (Aug. 12).

A year ago this July, I had the opportunity of visiting the Jerusalem mall, and I would like to commend Sarner on his succinct observations. Indeed, all that is currently valued in North American society is reflected in the shopping mall, like it or not. These values are rapidly being assumed by Israelis. This is no surprise, as both of our societies are based heavily on consumption of material goods.

The contrast of standing at the Western Wall at noon and in the Malcha Mall the same evening is almost too great a mindset change to imagine. From Wall to mall, though, is the essence of the miracle of Israel and to my observation, many Israelis shift from idealism to realism quite effortlessly.

One glaring omission, however, by Sarner: At every turn and corridor, the presence of the Israeli army is felt. We all understand the need for this added security, but it takes some getting used to – young soldiers in tight-knit groups with machine guns slung jauntily over their shoulders. Now wouldn't that be a sight at Yorkdale or Fairview Mall!

Restitution office opens in Vienna

The Federation of Jewish Communities in Austria has recently opened a claims office for Jewish Nazi victims in and from Austria as well as their heirs. The claims office will document individual claims in the attempt to build a premise for the future restitution or compensation of Jewish property.

Despite the fact that Austrian legislation currently does not provide for the recovery or compensation of Holocaust-era assets, the claims office said it was committed to supporting restitution claims of Holocaust survivors and their heirs.

Perspectives

Towards constitutionalism: Israel's next 50 years

By BEN ARCHIBALD

Prime Minister Ehud Barak's recent decision to expand the cabinet to 24 ministers is symptomatic of a broader problem undermining the legitimacy of Israel's institutions of government.

Now in its 51st year of existence, Israel is still in search of a constitution enshrining the basic values of a state founded on a number of competing ideologies.

The Zionist enterprise achieved its primary goal – the establishment of a Jewish state in our ancestral home.

One task is left undone, the preservation of that home based on respect for the rule of law and the philosophical "other." The intolerance that has penetrated all groups of Israeli society has created a cycle of justified resentment on all sides.

Supporters of Shas are, by and large, not haredim. On the contrary, they belong to groups of Oriental Jews that have largely been marginalized throughout the state's history. Similarly, the secular majority in Israel are not venomous anti-religionists, but a frustrated segment of the population that continues to be taken for granted by the centre parties. The Ashkenazi religious parties are not anti-democrats but true democrats who continue to get funding for their yeshivot.

Democracy is an imperfect form of government, often reflective of mob rule, not public order and good morals.

Meretz screams religious extortion and Shas screams discrimination while Prime Minister Barak expands the cabinet so that they can all scream at each other from ministerial high horses.

The expansion of the cabinet was ordered despite the reservations of Justice Minister Beilin and Attorney-General Rubinstein that Israel's Basic Laws should not be amended for purposes of political expediency.

Without a constitution, these words will continue to fall on deaf ears. The current State of Israel's society necessitates a discussion of the rule of law and the centrality that a constitution must take in political life.

Much like Canada, Israel is a hybrid nation that lies somewhere between parliamentary and constitutional democracy. Prior to the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by the Liberal government of Pierre Trudeau in 1982, Canada relied on both the British North America Act (BNA) of 1867 and then in 1960, a federal statute entitled the Bill of Rights in order to address the fundamental values of our democracy.

The BNA Act established the rules of federalism. However, it is not a single document with a definite meaning like the American constitution.

The parliamentary system relies on the moderation of elected officials of the legislature and rules of the common law in addressing rights of citizens. As noted by Canadian constitutional scholar Peter Hogg, like many developing countries Canada felt the need to adopt a clear statement outlining the basic rights of its citizens after witnessing the atrocities of WW II.

The heightened concern for civil liberties in the postwar era led the Progressive Conservative government of Prime Minister Diefenbaker to pass the Bill of Rights.

Unlike Trudeau, Diefenbaker was not willing to expend the political capital necessary to create a constitutional structure for Canada. As a result, the Bill of Rights was merely a legislative initiative binding on federal law and subject to amendment by a simple majority in Parliament.

Basic values were not supreme. They remained contingent on the moderation of parliamentarians. Although Canada is regarded as a moderate nation, Trudeau felt it necessary to go a step further; severing constitutional ties with the United Kingdom and adopting a charter applicable equally to the federal and provincial governments, subject to specific amending procedures. In effect, the charter limits the supremacy of parliament.

It is only with the adoption of the charter that Canadian courts have aggressively addressed issues striking at the heart of every democracy: the rights of the individual and the minority against the majority and the state.

Successive Israeli governments have yet to demonstrate the necessary political will needed in order to ease the transition from the Basic Laws to a proper constitutional or charter-like structure.

True, the adoption of the charter exacerbated the question of Quebec independence and forced the hand of the judiciary at the expense of parliament.

However, it has also become the touchstone of Canadian values and the supremacy of the rule of law. Rejecting the looser structure of the BNA Act and the impotence of the Bill of Rights, the charter states that "[t]he Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada."

Israel needs such a touchstone, or the Knesset and the courts will continue their descent into irrelevance as the Israeli electorate continues to fragment into pieces, breaking down the glue that holds political societies together – the rule of law.

Above:
Aharon Barak, at his swearing in as Israel's chief justice in November 1993.

Below:
Secular and religious Israelis clash during the election campaign in May. The author argues that a constitution might help to "placate the majority." [Israel photos]

The drafting of a constitutional document will prove to be a very difficult political initiative in the Israeli context. Although Israel sees itself as a nation preoccupied with the principles of justice and freedom, in many ways it has yet to broach these issues.

Israel's raison d'être is primarily to be a Jewish state for its Jewish citizens. Israel pays lip service to the idea of equality for all and has improved the lot of many Israeli Arabs who are not clamoring to live with any of their despotic neighbors. Despite this fact, they are not truly equal partners in the Zionist project. Much like its Islamic neighbors, Israel confuses the politically charged terms of nationality and religion.

At the outset, then, Israel must come to terms with the idea that a Jewish state cannot truly afford full equality to all of its citizens, the alternative being a bi-national secular state, an unacceptable proposition for the vast majority of Israelis and Jews of the Diaspora alike.

A further difficulty based on the confusion of religion and nationality is the role of Judaism in state life. Historically, Zionism has borrowed from the lore and history of religious Judaism in outlining a cohesive Zionist ideology. As noted by Israeli historian Eliezer Don-Yehiya, the use of the Star of David, the menorah, and the secularization of the Jewish holidays into agricultural ones created a de facto civil religion in Israel built on the religious history of our ancestors.

Within the constitutional framework, the legislator will be faced with a difficult balancing act: the creation of a civil religion of Judaism in Israel.

A viable Israel requires that Judaism be inextricably linked to its existence and character. However, the controversy that arose due to turbines being moved on Shabbat and the stoning of people driving cars cannot be addressed by the continually shifting winds of political change in the Knesset.

The Israeli legislators must, once and for all, decide how to constitutionalize the role of Judaism in society. Only then will tolerance and respect be possible between the haredim, secular and national religious Jews that are the modern political actors in Israeli society.

Much like the charter which has alienated some in Canada, an Israeli constitution will not placate everybody. Unlike coalition politics, however, a constitution will placate the majority based on a mutually agreed upon set of values that limits the power of any given party or ruling coalition.

The choice is between a constitution that addresses the concerns of the silent majority of secular and religious Israelis, or the continued futility of coalition governments that end up being the jack-of-all-trades and masters of nothing.

A constitution will not cure all the ills facing Israel's institutions of government. Coalitions will continually be formed and broken and narrow party interests will still have an impact on the direction taken by the majority.

What a constitution will do is create respect and supremacy for the rule of law as opposed to the supremacy of the crafty politician or mystical kabbalist.

Legal philosopher Ronald Dworkin suggests that the rule of law is a matter of principle and that citizens have inherent moral and political rights with respect to each other and the state. A constitution will allow these moral and political rights to be respected in the positive law of the State of Israel.

As opposed to speculation about the direct election of prime ministers or the cynical expansion of cabinets, politicians and pundits alike will be governed first and foremost by the rule of law.

The law is a living and breathing organism that will be subject to change based on specified amending procedures and not the back-room dealings of politicians.

The creation of the modern State of Israel is a testament to human achievement and the will of a people to survive. Its preservation as a viable state, as opposed to a collection of incongruous communities, requires the immediate attention of the legislature.

Another Wallenberg

Most Jews are familiar with the name Raoul Wallenberg, the representative of the Swedish government who saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews from the Nazis.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

He and I were born in the same year, but, alas, he has not been heard from since 1945 when he disappeared in Soviet Russia.

Only recently did I learn that Wallenberg was not alone in his magnificent efforts to save Jewish lives. There was a Swiss Embassy counsellor who also happened to be in Budapest and who, like Wallenberg, had saved many thousands of Jews. Yad Vashem in Jerusalem knew of his great contribution, and he has an honored place in the Avenue of the Righteous. Still, I had never heard of him, and I suspect neither have many of my readers.

Some time last June, my wife and I attended an exhibit of photographs. Mounted at the Bathurst Jewish Centre in Toronto, it showed a splendid selection of photographs dealing with Carl Lutz, the Swiss diplomat who matched the exploits of Wallenberg. Lutz had arrived in Budapest in early 1942 and was the chief of the Swiss legation's Department of Foreign Interests.

When the Germans occupied Hungary in early 1944, persecution of the Jews became a pastime with a radical Hungarian minority. The Jews – by this time aware of what happened to their co-religionists in other Nazi-occupied countries – besieged the Swiss legation. Lutz was not unacquainted with those seeking his help. As a young man he had spent some time in Palestine and had fallen in love with the country. Long before he was assigned to Budapest he had helped 10,000 Jewish children immigrate to Palestine. Budapest provided him with his second chance to protect Jewish lives.

When the deportations to Auschwitz began on May 15, 1944, Lutz decided to place the staff of the Jewish Council for Palestine under his diplomatic protection and to rename it The Department of Emigration of the Swiss Legation. He created a special relief organization and, with the help of volunteers, increased the staff from 15 to 150.

Not unlike Wallenberg, he issued tens of thousands of "protective letters" to Jews and housed many of them in special places. In the end he helped some 30,000 Jews (some even say 60,000!).

Switzerland has not enjoyed a positive connotation amongst us. Rejection of our people in time of need and the country's silent co-operation with the Nazis have been a black mark on its record. So much more so then, is it necessary to celebrate the exploits of Lutz who represented the best of his nation's ideals and refused to turn a blind eye to the persecution that had enveloped most of Europe.

Switzerland has been much on my mind. I agreed to take the chair for the distribution of funds donated by the banks in Switzerland for the support of needy Holocaust survivors. That task has now reached its final stage and payments are being readied.

Cleaning the stones

Apparently the Knesset of the State of Israel is about to allocate money for the cleaning of the stones of the Kotel. As admirable as the act of scrubbing away centuries of dirt may be, it should, in the spirit of the coming days of tshuvah and cheshbon nefesh, be preceded by taking stock of the use to which these stones at the wall have been put.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In the rush to cleanse the physical, we may have forgotten the spiritual. Prior to the High Holy Days we are to ask forgiveness of those we have wronged, else our prayers will ascend no higher than the ceiling. The radicals who have appointed themselves as the guardians of these stones would seem not to have fulfilled their need to ask forgiveness of the men, women and children they have driven from the area of prayer at the foot of this venerable edifice by their taunts, threats, and physical violence. In fact, it is they who have desecrated a potentially powerful place of prayer by their zealotry.

Before we clean the stones, let's clean up our act. If the Knesset wants to cleanse the area, then let it make sure the next time a group of women, or Conservative Jews, or Reform students want to daven with a minyan at the Kotel, that they are received with the same respect all Jews should be accorded.

Let the Knesset, en masse, walk to the Kotel and there do tshuvah for allowing these disgraceful actions to continue. Let the haredim see that the government of Israel does not countenance such disgusting behavior.

Ironically, these guardians of the wall are protecting structures built by slaves for the murderous King Herod. His work still stands all over Israel, but his life was a mixture of grovelling subservience to the Romans and lethal hatred directed at his Jewish subjects, as well as at his family. He murdered his wife, children, and relatives with abandon and impunity. How could this man have built anything holy? In fact, he did not.

The Western Wall is not holy – it is a majestic feat of engineering. It is we Jews who make a place holy, or profane, and right now this could be one of the most profane spots on earth. A good soaping will not do the job: It is not a national treasure. It has become a national disgrace.

What should we think when we enter the plaza around the wall? Should we think we are superior just because we wrap ourselves in piety? Is it not rather a time to remember the bloody history of this place? To approach these stones in humility with the feeling that we should have done better by our fellow humanity, Jew and non-Jew? To write a prayer note that seeks strength to resist the causeless hatred that brought the Temple down and left the stones toppled at the foot of the towers?

Yeshiyahu Leibowitz, brother of the brilliant and famous Bible scholar Nechama, was known for his spirited critiques of contemporary Jewish life. When he wrote about the holiness of the land of Israel, he saw correctly that many had turned the concept of holiness on its head. The land, he wrote (and I paraphrase) is not holy; the Temple Mount, the wall are not holy in themselves. Only peoples' actions make a place holy.

The prophetic spirit saw this quite clearly. Feasts and fasts were meaningless unless accompanied by a real change of heart and action.

I would rather see the Kotel restored to its former filthy aspect, as I saw it in 1964, when it faced a crowded and garbage-strewn alley, than to see its physical aspect whitened while its many meanings remain untouched. What are some of those meanings?

Dear members of the Israeli Parliament, please make sure that all minyanim are respected. That you can do for nothing, but it will take the courage to stand up against the intolerance and violence of the zealots.

And what should we do; we who live in the comfortable diversity of Jewish life in Canada? For one thing, it is not so comfortable. Some have already begun to teach contempt for "non-Orthodox" Judaism.

It is time for Canadian Orthodox leaders and shapers of opinion to announce publicly that we do not know the mind of God and therefore cannot judge our fellow Jews as they come to the Wall – that is not the task of humans, but left to the judgment of the Ultimate Judge.

Let us, down here, before the Messiah comes, just try to clean up our own souls. Otherwise we will end up consuming each other. And we know what happened the last time The evidence is there, at the foot of the Wall.

Zoos, postal codes and Jewish continuity

Last week, my son, David, left to begin his second year at the University of Toronto. He has lots of company. Many of his closest friends from Edmonton and Calgary – Isaac, Ari, Shelley, Erin, Barb, Rebecca, Gillie, Fred, Robin, Jeremy – are also off to university at either Toronto or York.

Bruce Ellman in Edmonton

They are some of the best and brightest young people in our communities. They come from families who are committed "Jewishly" – to a Jewish life and the institutions that support it: synagogues, school, Federation and so forth.

As Yogi Berra once said: "It is deja vu all over again."

When I was growing up in Cape Breton, the same phenomenon occurred. After high school, if a young person had the academic ability, he or she left Cape Breton for university in Montreal or Toronto or some other large city with a sizable Jewish population.

The university years represent the time of greatest risk of intermarriage. Jewish parents – whether in Cape Breton back then or in Alberta today – subscribe to a principle from the zoo keepers manual, namely: "If you want two animals to mate, put them in the same cage."

That is, if you want your son or daughter to marry someone who is Jewish and produce Jewish grandchildren for you, you have to make sure they are in the same city as other Jews and preferably – in order to increase your chances of success – a lot of other Jews!

This may be more delicately termed, "The Postal Code Theory of Jewish Continuity." The way this theory goes is as follows: Jewish education, Jewish youth groups, Jewish camps, and Israel experiences are not reliable predictors of Jewish continuity as judged by intermarriage rates. They help but they are not determinative. What is determinative is postal codes – that is the lowest intermarriage rates are in postal codes (and adjacent areas) where the highest concentration of Jews exist.

So, based upon the postal code theory, we send our young people off to Toronto. Our children may be back in the summer to help lead our summer camps but we know that, ultimately, they are unlikely to settle here. They are our future leaders and we are giving them away.

If this trend in Jewish migration is going on from Edmonton and Calgary, I assume it must also be a fact of life in other smaller centres. This places a special obligation on the Toronto Jewish community to make Jewish life both accessible and fulfilling for these students from around the country. It is important that the community recognize that there are a large number of Jewish students who are not Torontonians.

The community should not assume that these students are part of or even have access to the existing community, its organizations and institutions. Consequently, the community must encourage and support those organizations that reach out to the university students where they live – that is, on the campuses.

The community must bring Jewish life to the campus. Perhaps this can be done by enhanced support for the existing Jewish student organizations or perhaps new structures need to be created.

Kashrut is a case in point. The University of Toronto has no kosher dining options. It is difficult to even find kosher products, let alone kosher meat, in the vicinity of the campus. Virtually, all of the kosher facilities are up north. Surely, the community can do something about this.

Generally, however, I simply want the community to keep in mind that there is a body of Jewish students who have come to Toronto for an enhanced Jewish life and that the community should reach out to them.

Of course, some students do not leave Edmonton to go to university while others come here from other communities. Consequently, we have our obligations as well. We, too, must provide enhanced services to our university and college students.

Jewish student groups are often an afterthought in the local and national budgeting process. As a consequence, they are often under-resourced. Furthermore, we must recognize that the provision of Jewish campus services is a commitment that should be shared by the entire Canadian Jewish community. We, in Edmonton, must also bear our share of the commitment.

The Kirshner File

Beit El – portrait of a West Bank settlement

Jewish settlers in Beit El, a sedate West Bank settlement 20 minutes by car from Jerusalem and metres away from the Palestinian town of Ramallah, have adopted a wait-and-see attitude to the new Israeli government headed by Ehud Barak.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"We will judge him by his actions," said Beit El's mayor, Uri Ariel, warily.

The biblical site of Jacob's dream (Genesis 28:10-17), Beit El is home to approximately 5,000 settlers, all of whom are religious nationalists and almost all of whom are native Israelis. They live under a perpetual cloud of uncertainty determined by politics.

Formerly the site of a Jordanian army post, Beit El – twinned with Toronto's Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue – was established by an Israeli cabinet order in October 1977, shortly after Menachem Begin swept to power and promised to fill the West Bank with Jews.

Begin's heir, Yitzhak Shamir, was just as committed to consolidating Israel's hold over Judea and Samaria, populated in the main by Palestinian Arabs. But Yitzhak Rabin, Shamir's successor, distinguished between "political" settlements whose value was questionable and "strategic" settlements which could not be relinquished, even after a peace agreement with the Palestinians.

Benjamin Netanyahu, the prime minister from 1996 to 1999, championed the settlers' cause. Less than six months after being elected, he went to Beit El for the funeral of two of its residents, Ita Tzur and her son, Ephraim, who were killed by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a radical group opposed to the Oslo accords.

"The roots of the Jewish people are rooted in the land of Beit El," he told several thousand mourners. "They will be deepened."

Netanyahu kept his promise. The Israeli government restored financial incentives to all settlements beyond the Green Line, which Rabin had cancelled, and authorized Beit El's expansion, thereby defying repeated pleas from U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright for a "time out" in settlement activities.

In the May 17 election, during which Netanyahu was handily defeated by Barak, the vast majority of people in Beit El voted for the far-right National Union, as well as for the National Religious Party and Shas, according to Ron Meir, an Orthodox rabbi who made aliyah from Winnipeg in 1989 and settled here five years later.

The settlers were suspicious of Barak, whose party had an ambivalent record regarding settlements, building them from 1967 to 1977, but squeezing some of them dry in the post-1992 period.

In the wake of the election, however, Beit El settlers were reassured. Barak asked the National Religious Party – a fervent backer of settlements – to join his government. He pledged not to dismantle settlements, promising to let them grow. He expressed seemingly heartfelt remarks about his strong emotional ties to the West Bank.

Best of all, as far as they were concerned, Barak displayed a positive attitude to Beit El. "Losing parts of the land of Israel is, for me, extremely painful," he said, nine days after triumphing over Netanyahu. "There are places – not Efrat and not Beit El – where we will have to make difficult decisions."

As I sat opposite Uri Ariel, a grizzled man of 46 who is also vice-chair of the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, I asked him to comment on Barak's statement about Beit El.

Ron Meir

"We expect him to uphold his word," he replied. "Under Barak, things won't be as good as under Netanyahu. But we want to give him time."

Despite his cautious approach, Ariel – a National Alliance sympathizer born in Kibbutz Tirat Tzvi, in the Jordan Valley – believes that Beit El will remain under Israeli sovereignty.

Ron Meir, whose Canadian name was Robert Meyers, concurs. "I'm pretty confident that it will be part of Israel after a final settlement with the Palestinians," said Meir, an assistant news editor of Arutz Sheva, the settlers' radio station which operates out of a studio in Beit El.

Meir, though, fears that a number of Jewish settlements, those around Nablus, Jenin and the western rim of Ramallah, will be cast adrift and excluded from what he described as "the national consensus."

Ariel opposes Barak's plan to concentrate settlements in blocs as close as possible to the pre-1967 border. "I can't accept the notion of forcing Jews out of their homes," he said. "It's against Jewish law."

Ariel, who worked as an aide to Yitzhak Mordechai, the former defence minister and now transportation minister, is critical of the Oslo peace process. "It is a very bad agreement. It gives up portions of the land of Israel. It doesn't bring peace."

In line with his philosophy, Ariel is decidedly cool to the idea of an independent Palestinian state between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. "If the Palestinians want a state, they can choose Jordan," he said curtly.

Ariel's hardline sentiments are echoed by other settlers in Beit El, 40 percent of whom work outside its boundaries, mainly in Jerusalem.

Meir, a 38-year-old graduate of the University of Winnipeg and the father of seven children, argues that "the settlement enterprise" will be imperilled if Oslo is fully implemented. "Giving up land to a foreign and terrorist entity is not good for Israel," he claimed. "A Palestinian state would threaten Israel's interests. If we were dealing with the Swedes, a peaceful settlement would work."

The Palestinians, he said, should be given municipal and individual rights, nothing more.

Meir's neighbor, Helen Bohrer, a mother of eight originally from New York, also burns with ideological fervor. A resident of Beit El since the beginning of its existence 22 years ago, she firmly believes that she and her fellow settlers protect Israel's soft underbelly. "Israel itself cannot exist without these settlements," said Bohrer, who can see the lights of Tel Aviv from her steps.

Nor, as Meir agreed, would she choose to remain in Beit El if it is handed to the Palestinian Authority. "Look, it's not possible for a Jewish community to live under Palestinian rule. There is no precedent for peaceful coexistence. We don't teach our children hatred, but self-defence. All their textbooks are aimed at the eradication of Israel."

Bohrer, who enjoys the suburban feel of Beit El and its superior quality of life, criticized Netanyahu for having signed the 1998 Wye memorandum (which obligates Israel to withdraw from a further 13 percent of the West Bank and which, if fully implemented, will place Beit El in the uncomfortable position of being surrounded by areas under full or partial Palestinian control).

Bohrer, too, believes that Netanyahu "reneged" on his pledge to expand Beit El. In point of fact, Beit El, whose economy rests on several factories – a plant nursery and several shops – has expanded since the Tzurs' cold-blooded murder.

On the heels of this incident, Beit El received a parcel of land from the Israeli military base on the grounds, said Ariel. And now, three new neighborhoods – Even Pina, Nitzanei Beit El and Maoz Tzur – are currently in various stages of construction. Even Pina, which consists of 49 row houses with gardens, will be finished by summer's end. Nitzanei Beit El, with two-family villas and spacious apartments, is ready for occupancy. Maoz Tzur, which will consist of 200 flats of various sizes, will be finished within two years.

Ironically, the builders are Palestinian Arabs.

PLEASE HELP SAVE LISA'S LIFE

Ten year old Lisa, a Jewish girl, is in urgent need of a lung transplant. The costs are impossibly high for her family to bear — $800,000.
We still need $470,000.

"...we just look at how our daughter is dying slowly. Please, help us save Lisa's life."

Please give as much as you can. Help get others involved by telling your friends, family and business associates about this girl.

Our people have always helped each other in times of need.
What greater need than a child's life?

If one thousand people give $500 each, or 5000 people give a $100 each,we will reach our goal.
This is truly a desperate call. Please give.

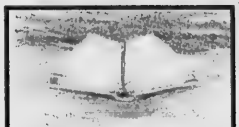
Time to renew our sights and address our faults



Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

A phrase we say immediately following the shofar blasts of Rosh Hashanah is usually translated inaccurately.

Following the shofar blasts we say the phrase, "Hayom harat olam," which is often translated as "Today is the birthday of the world," but that is not accurate. If you wanted to say, "Today is the birthday of the world," you would say, "Hayom, yom holedet." We assume that Rosh Hashanah is the day of creation of the world (or of man); so we cheat and translate the phrase as "Today is the birthday of the world." However, that is not an accurate translation.

What is the meaning of the word harat if it isn't birthday? It would seem to derive from the word herayon, pregnancy. Today is not the birth, it is the conception, the not yet completely born world.

What a great image – we are in the gestation of the world. The world is sitting in potential, about to be fulfilled, to be born. We are not in a finished world, we are in a moment of anticipation. The mood of pregnancy is of anticipation, of expectation, of great things yet to come.

This is the image of Rosh Hashanah. On Rosh Hashanah, we don't get mired in our failings, our mistakes, our wasting of potential. On Rosh Hashanah, we set the bar – we raise the expectations, we lift up the benchmark. We are people of enormous power, of power not yet fully born, of outstanding expectations. We can achieve truly great things.

On Yom Kippur, we face our failings and our disappointments. Left alone with only a Yom Kippur, we would get depressed. All that wasted opportunity, all those mistakes. However, coming after a Rosh Hashanah, we balance our view of ourselves – we are great and we make mistakes. We are powerful, though we often sink. We are reaching high, though sometimes we are dragged down

And that is the life of the Jew. Complexity, greatness and failing all in the same week. Rosh Hashanah renews our faith in ourselves, that we are a work in progress. On Yom Kippur we confront our failings. The failings don't define who we are – the stretching to be what we can be defines who we are.

Our avodah, our personal work this time of year, is to renew our sights, while addressing our faults.

Rabbi Tradburks is the spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto.

Yom Kippur a time for growth

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Unlike most Jewish holidays, Yom Kippur has few home rituals. Yet through some ancient and modern traditions, Yom Kippur can be more than just a day to endure but a time for meaningful growth. Today, some Yom Kippur suggestions (and a recipe or two) from the Jewish Highway.

Yosef Abramowitz has a suggestion for learning about personal development while creating an intriguing family keepsake [http://shamash.org/jfl/article/ykfamact.html]: On the day before Yom Kippur gather your family in the living room and have each person write a little letter to himself. Choose a topic like "What I would like to do to be a better person in the coming year."

Seal it, address it and mail it just prior to the next Yom Kippur. "You and your family members will enjoy receiving these annual letters, which can be used as a measuring stick for the past year." You can even save the letters in a scrapbook to create a precious record.

Although Yom Kippur may not be a kid's favorite holiday, there are some very good sites which help get across the day's message. The TorahTots site explains the rituals accompanied by some coloring pages for the major rituals [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/yomkipur/yomkstr.htm].

And the Awesome Days Kids' Club [http://www.vjholidays.com/rosh/kidsclub.htm] is full of activities, stories, crafts and even music. Shlock Rock's Shuckle Song is a lively three-minute, 40-second introduction to the rhythmic swaying during those long hours in synagogue.

While you're shuckling in shul, there's a good chance you're also pounding your chest with your fist. Some of the most powerful moments of the Yom Kippur liturgy is the Vidui or confession. As we pound, we sing "ashamnu, bagadnu, gazalnu..." an alphabetic recitation of regret for the wrongdoings of the past year. Mount Zion Torah Educational Centre takes a traditional look at the meaning of the Vidui [http://www.virtual.co.il/clients/mzts/holidays/newyear/confess.htm].

And in Perspectives, the Jewish magazine of Columbia University, L. J. Gold uses the Vidui prayer to take a contemporary and sometimes disturbing look at his own shortcomings [http://www.columbia.edu/cu/jsu/perspectives/issue3/arts/gold.html].

For more on Yom Kippur, visit the Orthodox Union [http://www.ou.org/chagim/yomkippur/], Yeshivat Har Etzion Yom Kippur Journal [http://vbmtorah.org/yk.htm], JewishFamily [http://www.jewishholidays.com/kippur.htm], the Union of American Hebrew Congregations [http://uahc.org/educate/parent/0202.html] and Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.vjholidays.com/rosh/yomkip.htm].

The most famous ritual of the day, of course, refers to what you don't do. In the Facts on Fasting [http://shamash.org/jfl/article/factsfasting.html], Ilene Springer looks at what fasting does to the body (and even at the possible benefits of going without food for over 24 hours). Her most important Yom Kippur fasting tip: drink plenty of liquids the previous day and again as soon as you break the fast. Bodies are 60 to 70 percent water, so dehydration – not hunger – is really your biggest problem.

Richard Israel adds that the pre-fast meal does not have to be hopelessly bland but do go easy on the salt [http://www.joi.org/celebrate/yomkipp/]. And don't look at the fast as a quick weight loss scheme. You can regain most of what you lost during the fast with a couple of pieces of cheesecake.

But what about after Neilah? In Break Fast Recipes for Yom Kippur, Joni Schockett has some suggestions for ways to end your day [http://shamash.org/jfl/article/ykbreakfast.html]. Break your fast with orange juice and don't stuff yourself. Here's what Joni and you could look forward to after the fast: a salmon mousse with couscous salad topped off by a sour cream coffee cake with apricots and prunes.

Have an easy fast and a G'mar Chatimah Tova.

A complex literary marriage

Vera, Portrait of a Marriage*, by Stacy Schiff (Random House, $41.95).

One especially dim morning in the spring of 1952 when Vladimir Nabokov was lecturing to a class of students at Cornell University, his wife Vera, who attended all of his sessions, left her seat to turn on the amphitheatre lights.

Books
Bernard Baskin

As she did so a beatific smile spread across her husband's face.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he gestured proudly from the front of the room to the back, "my assistant."

But Vera was more than just Vladimir's assistant. She was his ideal reader, muse, inspiring collaborator, constant source of comfort and provider of life's necessities.

Stacy Schiff makes clear that Nabokov was not a 20th-century person. Did he really live in this world? He wouldn't or couldn't type, drive, speak German, retrieve a lost object, fold an umbrella or even cut a book's pages.

He routinely asked after the fuss over Watergate: What had "that Mr. Watergate fellow done to get himself into such a scrape?"

It is no wonder that Vera became the busy, indispensable manager of all of her husband's practical and business needs. Publishers, lawyers, colleagues and friends all agreed that "he would have been nowhere without her."

Vera was born into an affluent, assimilated St. Petersburg Jewish family which managed just in time to escape the ravages of the Russian Revolution. She offered only one view of her distant ancestors, asserting that her father "traced his descent in direct line from a celebrated though abstruse commentator of the Talmud who flourished in Spain in the 17th century, and who traced his descent in direct line from the ancient Judean kings."

Although she was not religious, she insisted, at every turn, on her Jewish origins. When the New York Post in 1958 referred to her as a Russian aristocrat, she responded, "In your article, you describe me as an émigré of the Russian aristocratic class. I am very proud of my ancestry, which actually is Jewish."

Asked if she was Russian her reply was simple, "Yes, Russian and Jewish."

On a trip to Wyoming, a motel operator indicated his dislike of New York Jews. "What is wrong with the Jews?" the Nabokovs asked their landlord, who was happy to enlighten his guests, advising them that Jews "always try to knife you, get the better of you."

"Well, I am Jewish, and I have no intention of swindling you," Vera retorted. The landlord fell all over himself with apologies.

Vladimir, like his father before him, was a philo-Semite. No manifestation of anti-Semitism was too small to irk him.

In a restaurant in New Hampshire in 1946, he noticed a sign, "We welcome strictly Christian clientele."

Vladimir wasted no time. "And what would happen if a bearded Jesus Christ drove up, in an old Ford, with his mother (black scarf, Polish accent)?"

Nabokov is a most demanding writer. He comes across as a man well-born and well-educated, brought up in surroundings both expensive and cultured; a man who is at once a linguist, a scholar, a natural scientist. In every line of his prose one listens to a supremely articulate voice recreating experience in a carefully structured and highly poetic manner.

Vera, too, was widely regarded as an aristocrat. Writes Schiff, "The adjectives that most commonly attached themselves to her suggested as much. She was formidable, regal, stately and imperious."

Vladimir died in 1976. For the remaining 15 years of her life, Vera lived in Switzerland, comforted by her son Dimitri, meeting and corresponding with family members and friends and overseeing translations of her husband's books.

The author, Schiff, who comes from western Canada has fashioned a long, detailed narrative — elegantly written, diligently researched and lucidly presented. He successfully depicts a literary marriage that was complex and intriguing, a union of one of the century's most original writers and a dedicated, resourceful and wise woman.

Abraham said a role model for setting educational goals

By REBECCA NADLER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jews can take direction from Abraham when setting their goals and priorities in Jewish education and outreach, says Rabbi Yitzchak Breitowitz.

Speaking recently at an Ohr Somayach day of study at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Rabbi Breitowitz, of the Woodside Synagogue in Silver Springs, Md., an associate professor of law at the University of Maryland and a visiting lecturer at Ohr Somayach Jerusalem, said Abraham was called Avraham Haivri, meaning Abraham who comes from the other side of the river.

This is not just a geographic description, the rabbi said, but rather a description of his character.

Abraham was not swayed by public opinion. He would stand alone on the other side and do God's will. Yet the Bible tells us that his tent was open at all times and on all sides. Abraham was open to all human beings and saw potential in every human being no matter what their character and beliefs, as every person is God's creation.

Rabbi Breitowitz set out goals for Jewish education and outreach programs. He said we are living at a time when there is great moral depravity and concern about social disintegration. Many Jews are aching for meaning and purpose in their lives. They want to be connected to something larger than themselves.

> 'Everyone is a victim of someone else'

He said Rodger Kamenetz, in his book The Jew and The Lotus, points out that nine out of every 10 western converts to Buddhism were originally Jewish. While this might be seen as disastrous, Rabbi Breitowitz said that in fact there is a silver lining in the phenomenon, because Jews who turn to cults are Jews whose souls are crying out for meaning.

"The Orthodox community has a responsibility to demonstrate to the rest of the community that the Torah matters," he said.

One of the goals for reaching out to Jews and teaching Torah, he said, is to provide a cognitive awareness of which are the important values in life.

Everyone must realize that they are responsible for their own spiritual growth. "Everyone is a victim of someone else," he said, but we must give Jews the courage to take charge of their lives. Spiritual awakening must be coupled with the realization that "what we are is not what we have to be."

He stressed the importance of following Abraham's model of accepting all people for what they are.

In a practical sense, this means that Jews who turn to the Torah for meaning and significance in their lives should be encouraged to utilize elements of their past and draw inspiration and strength from their experiences to better serve God.

The day of study attracted approximately 300 people who came to learn and discuss basic concepts of Judaism. Topics included free will versus destiny, the accuracy of oral law and the validity of Judaism.

Seniors' attack prompts forum on anti-Semitism

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Even relatively minor hate-motivated incidents should be reported, because they provide evidence on which policies and funding decisions are based, stressed Karen Mock at a recent community forum on The Rise of Anti-Semitic Violence in North America.

The national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights was one of four speakers at the event held last Thursday night at the Winchevsky Centre.

A self-described grass roots group of activists organized the panel in response to the beating of two senior citizens last month on their way to Friday night services at Torath Emeth Jewish Centre. Among the co-sponsors of the event were United Jewish People's Order and the Winchevsky Centre.

A related upcoming event is a vigil planned for Sept. 23, in front of the Holocaust Memorial at Earl Bales Park from 7 to 8 p.m. (For further information call the National Coalition Building Institute-Canada at 416-651-3444.)

Also participating in the forum at the Winchevsky Centre were Danny Fine, director, community relations committee, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Bonnie Burstow, an anti-fascist researcher who teaches at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education; and Elisa Kukla, an activist and observant Jewish lesbian.

Victims of hate crimes (or hate-related incidents that are not classified as criminal) need the "sensitive, caring support of friends and family" to inform them of the importance of reporting, Fine said.

Witnesses, not just victims, can also report, Mock said. Following the Torath Emeth beating, lesser incidents such as harassment and egg pelting came to light, and the attack was no longer seen as an isolated incident. When people put up with indignities, the perpetrators are emboldened, she said.

Mock also noted the importance of like-minded organizations working together. When the 519 Church St. Community Centre documents gay bashings and the League documents anti-Semitic incidents, and the two organizations work together to lobby for the creation of hate crime units, for example, "that's when we have success," she said.

"We need to use all the tools – the law, education, and community liaison, community partnerships, community dialogue."

Burstow agreed with Mock and Fine on the importance of keeping statistics, but cautioned that she believes they are deceptive because the numbers alone don't reflect the severity of the incidents.

"We are seeing the type of violent incidents against Jews we have not seen for a long time, and I think we have to take it very seriously," she said. Recent shootings of Jews in Los Angeles and Chicago can't be compared to an anti-Semitic sign, she noted.

'We have to take it very seriously'

Even the overturning of Jewish headstones in Winnipeg is "of a different proportion" (over 200 stones) than similar incidents in the past.

The crimes are not random, Burstow emphasized. "They have political ideologies and history behind them" and are traceable to a "rise in virulent fascism" over the past two decades, she believes.

The mission of fascist groups such as Aryan Nations – with which Buford Furrow, the shooter in the Los Angeles incident, was affiliated – is not to harass Jews, but to eliminate them, she emphasized.

Among the reasons behind the current spate of violence, Burstow cited the turn of the millennium (the time fascists indicated they would take over) and, most notably, the Internet. "In the '70s you could find one lonely fascist [on a street corner] handing out pamphlets.

"The Internet revolution was the revolution the fascists needed, and they are using it to the fullest. Today there are thousands of Web sites telling you what to do and think about blacks, Jews and gays."

Complaints about Web sites may be made to the Canadian Association of Internet Providers, known as CAPE, it was noted in the question-and-answer period. The association has already taken an active role, said Mock.

Stereotypes do lead to violence, Burstow warned.

She urged people — especially young, old and disabled people — not to go to synagogue alone, for safety reasons.

It's also critical, she said, to mend the divisions between the black community and the Jewish community, and to create solidarity with other victims of fascism. "We need to commit ourselves to honest and comprehensive dialogue... The consequences of doing otherwise are simply unthinkable."

Kukla noted the connections between anti-Jewish and anti-queer violence. In both cases, the myth of being able to pass as part of the larger community can lead to a lack of protection, she cautioned.

Chabad activist, 43, killed in car crash

TORONTO — More than 1,000 people attended the funeral of Sheryl Latinsky, who was killed in a car crash at Leslie Avenue and Green Lane on Sept. 5. She was 43.

Her husband, Arnold, was killed in an auto accident 13 years ago.

Latinsky was on her way home from taking her son Leonard, 18, to his first day at McMaster University in Hamilton when the crash occurred.

She was buried at the Chabad Lubavitch of Markham section of Pardes Shalom.

An activist in the Jewish community, Latinsky was a founding member of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham and raised funds for the new synagogue centre on Green Lane.

She also helped raise funds and collect food and clothing for a family in Mississauga whose child was killed in a car crash – people she never previously knew.

Surviving Latinsky are another son, Raymond, 15, her father, Morrie, and four sisters.

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

Puppets do the talking to educate children ages 4-14 about drug awareness, substance abuse and HIV/AIDS. People with enthusiasm and an ability to relate to young people make great volunteers. There is an eight-week training program. The commitment is for ½ day a week for the school year. Volunteer Centre of Toronto-North York 631-6117.

Baycrest Centre will be offering a volunteer chaplain training program starting this October and is presently recruiting volunteers to participate in this program. Training will include such information as the aging process, long-term care service delivery and the role of a volunteer chaplain. Volunteers will offer clients an opportunity to discuss spiritual issues and receive support from already trained volunteer chaplains. Must be available once a week for six months for training and at least a year commitment. Sandy Frankel, 785-2500, ext. 2576.

Earlscourt Child and Family Centre needs caring and committed volunteers. You can make a difference in a child's life! Contact Volunteer Department, 654-8981.

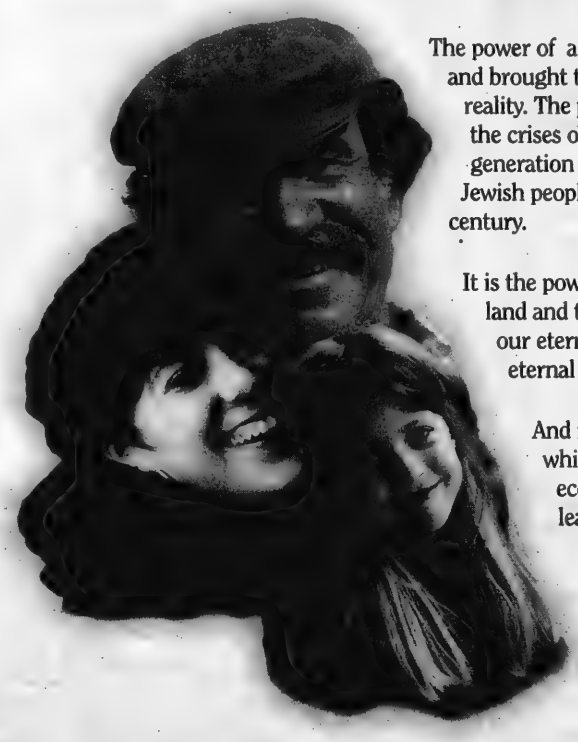
Baycrest Centre is looking for volunteers once a week to record patients' behaviors when transferring to and from a wheelchair. Research background and computer skills would be an asset. This would be an excellent opportunity for a psychology student or someone who has an interest in rehabilitation medicine. 785-2500, ext. 2576.

STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS

What our parents gave to us, we give to our children.
The power we get is the power we give.

The power of a generation



The power of a generation that overcame adversity and brought the dream of the State of Israel to reality. The power of a generation that witnessed the crises of survival. The power of a new generation that will forge the future of the Jewish people and lead Israel into the twenty-first century.

It is the power of Israel which unites Jews, across land and through time, linking generations in our eternal hope and in fulfillment of our eternal obligation.

And it is the strength of Israel Bonds which has helped Israel to become an economic and technological world leader.

Invest in the success of the State of Israel and guarantee the future of our people for generations to come.

TORAH DEDICATIONS

Two Torah dedications on Sept. 5 drew hundreds in Thornhill. (Clockwise, from bottom), Davis Fluss holds the Torah he and his wife Betty dedicated in memory of his parents, Saul and Freda Fluss, and father-in-law George Braun. The Torah was marched up Bathurst Street to the new Chabad Centre on Flamingo Road; Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, executive director of Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario, carries the Torah, accompanied by the centre's spiritual leader, Rabbi Mendel Kaplan; Rabbi David Schochet holds a Torah carried in an earlier, joyous procession along Clark Avenue, alongside Rabbi Yisroel Landa, who spearheads Chabad activities for Israelis in the GTA; Hundreds of people, young and old alike, took part in the raucous, torch-lit parade, from the BAYT shul, to the Lubavitch Synagogue on Chabad Gate. The Torah was begun over a year ago by members of the Israeli community. [Ron Csillag photos]

UJA Federation Leadership Profile

Lynn Leads By Example

Lynn Kirshin may not consider herself a developer in the traditional sense but when it comes to developing young leaders she's an expert.

As Co-Chair of UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet with David Beron, one of Kirshin's highest priorities is reaching out to young adults seeking greater community involvement. The way to do this, she believes, is making people feel welcome and exposing them to as many opportunities as possible. "I find people are searching for a meaningful way to connect."

Kirshin's own search began after graduating from Osgoode Law School when she enrolled in UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program on the advice of a friend. "I learned so much about the community, where my own interests lie and a wide range of leadership skills," explains Kirshin, who quickly became active in a wide range of UJA Federation committees.

"There is always room at UJA Federation for young adults committed to community," says Lynn Kirshin.

Kirshin served as member of the Leadership Development Planning Committee in 1996 after co-chairing a mission to Poland and Israel in 1995 which she calls "one of the most memorable experiences of my life. Not only did I meet incredible people...I had the opportunity to see, first hand, how UJA Federation improves the lives of Jews far from my home."

Together with her Co-Chair, Kirshin helps to create the vision behind all Young Leadership initiatives, including a recent golf tournament, the highly successful Hands On Toronto volunteer project and the National Young Leadership Conference.

In the months ahead, she is focusing heavily on educating young leaders through interactive workshops on topics such as communal agencies, and organizing missions to community agencies. "Education is a key component in building strong leaders," says Kirshin. "Exposing them to the numerous ways in which UJA Federation helps people is critically important."

Mission Mazal Tov

Six young men and women and their families recently returned from Israel where they celebrated their bar and bat mitzvahs on UJA Federation's second annual Family Bar/Bat Mitzvah Mission. (Below) back row - Janice and Jeff Fine, second row, Fred and Rosalind Shapero and front Aaron and Jonathan Fine.

Spirit of Israel Campaign Grows

At the same time as Toronto's UJA Federation Campaign, Israel's affiliated Spirit of Israel Campaign is also picking up speed.

"In just two years we've grown to over 45,000 contributors," reports Spirit of Israel Executive Director Joe Dushansky. The Campaign, which raises funds to primarily help Jews in need, is modeled after and linked to worldwide UJA Federation Campaigns. It is Israel's first national grass roots fundraising drive ever.

"Close to 46% of worldwide Jewry lives in Israel," explains Dushansky. "It's natural for this population to takes its proper place in the Jewish world by contributing to Jewish causes."

Having increased significantly from a modest 8,000 donors at its start, the Spirit of Israel's steady growth has been attributed to a massive marketing campaign which includes television ads and direct mailings, the most recent of which went to 350,000 households. "Close to 4,000 additional donors have responded to our Rosh Hashana mailing," says Dushansky, who would like to build a donor of base of 500,000 over the next 5 years.

Funds raised in Israel by the campaign will be allocated to programs assisting the elderly and children at risk.

Helping Hand

UJA Federation recently helped members of Toronto's Turkish community conduct telethons in order to raise funds for earthquake victims in Turkey. In expressing his gratitude, Hassan Silah, President of the Federation of the Canadian Turkish Association, (shown with volunteer) called Toronto's Jewish community "tremendously caring and compassionate."

UJA Federation Campaign 2000

Telethon Kick-Off

This week's first series of telethons for UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 have helped to propel the campaign past the $15 million mark.

Among the dozens of campaigners were both veteran volunteers and teenagers as young as 13.

"It's amazing to see such a great turnout so early in the campaign," notes Dov Altman, who is chairing the telethon committee with Judy Engel and Rosanne Ain. "We have a large task ahead of us, so it's wonderful to get off to such a great start."

Jason and Susan Kendall have been answering the call to help Jews in need for over 5 years by participating in UJA Federation telethons.

"The telethons offer people of all ages and backgrounds a very rewarding opportunity to increase their community involvement" notes Debbie Kimel, who is co-chairing UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 with Abe Glowinsky and Howard Price.

"I really enjoy giving my time to such a great cause," says grade 10 CHAT student Miri Ben-Dat. "I believe personal happiness begins with the happiness you bring others and thats why the work I do for UJA Federation is so important," says campaigner Gary Stern.

"It's a pleasure talking to so many generous donors in one day," adds Peter Ekstein, whose active involvement in UJA Federation has included dozens of telethons. "I enjoy being a part of this great effort."

The September 13-16 telethons feature a contest named Answer the Call. Contributors contacted during telethons who say "Hi UJA, I'm answering the call" and increase their gift, receive a reward. Their names will also be entered into a draw for a grand prize at the end of December.

Additional funds raised during Campaign 2000 will be allocated toward new projects that assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity and rescue Jews in danger.

Young adults join leadership seminar

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Thirty-five young Jewish adults from around the world recently participated in a month-long Young Jewish Leadership Diplomatic Seminar in Israel.

The seminar, called Bayit Meshutaf (Shared Home), was a pilot project of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

"The...program is a new and special opportunity for young leaders in the Diaspora to become better acquainted with Israel and to enhance their Jewish identity," said David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

Participants from 16 countries and a variety of backgrounds came together in Israel to learn and to share their experiences of living Jewish lives in the Diaspora.

Three Canadians took part in this first seminar: Lisa Cameron, a research librarian at the Library of Parliament in Ottawa; Laurent Ziri, a chartered accountant in Montreal; and Bernard Levy-Soussan, a lawyer, also of Montreal.

Ranging in age from 19 to 30, participants represented a wide spectrum of Jewish involvement, from volunteers to full-time staff in lobbying organizations.

"The goal of the Foreign Ministry," said Sultan, "is to contribute to the education of the next generation of leaders of the Jewish community about life in Israel and the complex issues of the peace process."

This sentiment was echoed by Lisa Cameron. "The leaders of tomorrow are the young leaders of today," she said.

The intense program included lectures aimed at increasing participants' knowledge of Israel in the international arena, and talks about the Middle East, Israeli culture and Jewish life.

"For the first two weeks, I sat in a classroom from morning until evening," said Cameron. "I just learned so much; it was really excellent."

Bernard Levy-Soussan, Lisa Cameron and Laurent Ziri.

Tours of the country and visits to Israeli historical and cultural sites were also part of the program, and participants attended films, theatre and dance performances.

"They are people trying to make a difference in their Jewish communities." Cameron said of the new friends she met at the program.

They have already set up a Web site to help them keep in touch and share ideas and experiences,.

"People within the organized Jewish communities can help each other. We have made a very valuable link among ourselves and between ourselves and Israel," Cameron said.

As Rosh Hashanah approaches, the community's thoughts (and prayers) turn expectantly towards what is in store for the new year. While we claim no particular divine insight, below are a series of predictions.

• Jean Chretien will not resign – at least not before he travels to Israel for an official visit. While in the region, he will also visit Lebanon/Syria and Jordan for sure. Currently, the tiff over at Fort Pearson (Foreign Affairs) is whether this should be expanded into a commercial "Team Canada" trip. If so, then Chretien will have to include at least some of the Gulf States in the itinerary.

• Ehud Barak will not resign – at least not before he travels to Canada for an official visit. The reciprocal trip might be arranged around the Parliamentary dinner extravaganza put on every few years by the Canada-Israel Committee. The CIC is overdue for such an event, and apparently, one is in the works for March 2000. The dinner brings together the elite of the political community with Jews from across the country, about 1,800 people in total...a perfect showcase for both Chretien and Barak. Chretien will need some good PR because...

• The federal government will, once again, ignore demands for a dedicated Holocaust museum. Instead, it will designate a symbolic date on the calendar as The Day of Tolerance and Respect. Each year on that date, schools and communities across the country will reflect on all the suffering experienced during this century as the result of intolerance and racism. As far as a museum goes, the government's position will be that all stakeholders (Jews, Armenians, etc.) have to join together to develop and finance a national museum.

• A snap referendum announcement by Lucien Bouchard will trigger huge angst within Quebec's Jewish community. However, at the end of the day, the federalist forces will prevail with a sufficiently convincing win to put the Quebec question to bed for the next few years. Eric Maldof will not feature in the debate since he will lose the Liberal nomination in Mount Royal.

• Reformers and Tories will express exasperation with their respective leaders and turf them both. Unfortunately, the two camps will still be unable to bridge the ideological and emotional gap between the two parties.

To all of our faithful readers, best wishes for a joyous New Year!

Holocaust memorial dedicated in Kingston

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Holocaust memorial designed to warn of the dangers of abuse of authority was dedicated this month at the Correctional Services of Canada's staff college in Kingston, Ont.

The two-foot high bronze sculpture was unveiled before 23 newly minted prison guards, for whom the work will serve as a warning against the abuse of power once they are on the job.

College commissioner Ole Ingstrup told the graduating class of correctional officers that Nazi perpetrators of "heinous" crimes against Jews sometimes ignored their own human values and succumbed to the lure of power.

Ingstrup told the guards they would have "to face the daily challenges of working in a prison environment. It's easy to become insensitive in the kind of environment we work in."

The memorial is the only Holocaust monument in Kingston. The public will be able to visit it.

The work is by famed Philadelphia forensic sculptor Frank Bender, who reconstructs the facial features of crime victims with such accuracy that identification of the victim is made possible.

Bender has worked for years with law-enforcement agencies, which often produce only skulls or bone fragments of murder victims. Bender is credited with helping to solve dozens of mysteries that had police stumped.

In addition to his forensic work, he is a world-renowned sculptor.

A few years ago, he was part of a project that involved age-projection sculptures of children murdered during the Holocaust, showing how they might look today as adults.

The Kingston memorial shows families being herded into camps by German guards. It's topped by a bulldozer to symbolize the dangers of trying to bury memory.

A three-sided polished steel screen behind the sculpture allows the viewer to see the work from any side without moving.

"I'm not usually moved by sculpture, but this is breathtaking," said Rabbi Ronald Weiss of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), and the official chaplain to Jewish prison inmates in Ontario.

Rabbi Weiss, who spoke at the dedication ceremony, said the idea behind the monument is to sensitize those in power to the potential of abuse and bias.

The sculpture came to Kingston in a roundabout way.

It was a gift to the college by a group of Holocaust survivors in Nebraska, who wanted an artwork that would speak to new prison guards.

Apparently, strict rules prevented the work from being given to a similar facility in the United States. But when Brendon Reynolds, the college's deputy commissioner, found out about it, he met with an official of the International Corrections and Prisons Association and persuaded the survivors in Nebraska to look northward to Canada.

One of them, Joe Boin, also addressed those at the unveiling, telling the graduates of his 4 ½ years in Buchenwald and Auschwitz, despite the fact his father was a German-born Lutheran.

Speaking at the dedication, Bender said that the inspiration for the work came from the experiences of his uncle, Frederick Adler, who served in the American Army in Germany, and was captured.

The Nazis insisted Adler was Jewish (he wasn't) and sent him to a concentration camp. Bender recalled. His uncle barely survived.

The other spark, he said, came from his own work as a forensic sculptor, which has included years of witnessing senseless crimes and atrocities.

Rabbi Shmuel Spero of the Minsker Shul who also has a part in this production.

The marchers, who number about 800 now, fill the street outside the shul. The young papier mâché boy and his grandmother are struck by the angel of death and the dibbuk. She collapses on the steep steps of the building. The technical staff on the roof lower snow flakes. The boy knocks on the door of the shul and Rabbi Spero appears.

The rabbi blows the shofar and the drummers respond. Then out comes the Nayeh Velt (new world) angel with a gigantic papier mâché challah in tow. The rabbi blesses the challah and gives a piece to the grandmother. She is revived. Women wearing papier mâché masks and colorful kerchiefs on their heads – they are carrying large baskets filled with real challah – distribute pieces of the bread to the crowd.

The music starts up again – this time it's celebratory. Three 15-foot klezmer puppets spill out of the alley way, along with other large cheerful-looking papier mâché characters. They join the procession, as it heads down Spadina Avenue.

Participants dance to the rhythms of klezmer and samba as the Nayeh Velt angel leads the way from the heart of the Toronto Jewish community's roots in Kensington Market to Harbourfront Centre, the main venue of the Ashkenaz festival.

Canada's first all-kosher supermarket opens its doors

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL— What is billed as Canada's first all-kosher supermarket has opened with a promise to deliver to kosher consumers the same convenience and professionalism other consumers expect when filling their grocery orders.

Le Monde Cachère/Kosher World in Decarie Square offers 30,000 square feet filled with the gamut of kosher foods and household supplies, as well as a fully stocked produce department.

It looks much like any other supermarket with aisles and aisles of packaged goods, dairy and frozen food sections, meat and fish counters, bakery, take-out service, and banks of cash registers. Customers can take advantage of such features as car orders, home delivery and indoor parking.

Le Monde Cachère is under the supervision of the Jewish Community Council of Montreal (Vaad Ha'ir), and has the endorsement of the Sephardi Grand Rabbinat du Québec, which has its own kashruth supervisory body.

Everything in the store either bears the Vaad's MK or a hechsher of any of the agencies around the world recognized by the Vaad, said executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel. Le Monde Cachère carries many imported goods, some exclusive to Montreal.

There are two mashgichim on site – one in the meat department, and another for general supervision. The meat is glatt kosher, which will satisfy the strictest observers, Rabbi Emanuel said.

The store is, of course, closed on Shabbat and holidays.

The premises were formerly occupied by the Joseph Anthony supermarket, and like its predecessor the new store is operated by Decarie Square, which is owned by David Azrieli's Canpro Investments Ltd. The store manager, Spyro Stylianopoulos, though not Jewish, seems to have already gained the confidence and affection of many customers for his attentiveness

"We believe the kosher consumer should enjoy the same quality control, cleanliness and service as is found in other supermarkets," said Canpro vice-president Myer Bick.

Bick is confident Le Monde Cachère will be able to compete successfully with the kosher sections in other supermarkets.

"This is one-stop shopping. The kosher customer can come in here and not have to worry about checking labels," Bick said. "Everything is under one roof, and the quantity and variety of the products can't be compared to what is found in the chains. It's the largest selection of kosher products anywhere in Canada."

According to his research, the next largest purveyor of kosher food in Canada is an IGA store in the Toronto area, which has a 9,000-square-foot kosher section.

Le Monde Cachère kashers and packages its own meat on the premises. Most meat will be sold cut-to-order, although pre-packaged meat is available too. There is also an on-site bakery, and a kitchen that provides take-out foods and catering services.

As far as price is concerned, Bick conceded that because of the buying power of the chains, Le Monde Cachère can't match the prices the chains offer for national brands, however it should be able to be competitive on those wares produced strictly for the kosher market. "And the meat should definitely be cheaper because we do it ourselves, cutting out a processor," he added.

At Passover, Bick said the store will be especially kashered and remain open. A separate kosher "warehouse" will likely be opened next door as well.

Rabbi Emanuel said a store like Le Monde Cachère should encourage greater numbers of Jews to keep kosher because of the availability, variety and the competitive prices.

"We approached [Decarie Square] to be involved in this project, and we've worked hard for months to get it off the ground," he said.

Kosher consumer Roz Schneidman noted that there is a need for this type of kosher food merchandising. "How well it will do will depend on how they keep it up. It has to be clean and the staff friendly, and, most of all, the prices have to be competitive."

Other people interviewed (they did not want their names used) said they were pleased to find everything they need under one roof, and that they don't have to worry about non-kosher foods getting mixed in with their groceries. One couple said the personalized service is enough to keep them coming back.

Certainly, Le Monde Cachère was bustling in its first week of operation. The novelty, opening specials and pre-holiday shopping may explain the rush. The people with a stake in the enterprise hope that those are not the only reasons for the rush and that the store is filling a previously unmet need in Montreal.

Help us move into our new home.

The new Apotex Centre Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Louis and Leah Posluns Centre for Stroke and Cognition is almost finished.

We're heading into the home stretch!

The push is on to complete the new Home for its scheduled January, 2000 opening. The exterior brickwork is nearly finished and almost all of the windows have been installed. Landscaping will begin in just a few weeks.

Inside, resident rooms are being painted, the cherry wood cupboards are being installed, and the ceramic tiles are being laid in the bathrooms and spa areas. Spacious outdoor balconies have been built on every resident floor overlooking the west courtyard. A glass skylight supported by white steel beams provides plenty of natural light in the indoor atrium.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

For more information on how you can be part of completing the Apotex Centre Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Louis and Leah Posluns Centre for Stroke and Cognition, call Shirley Worth in the Baycrest Centre Foundation at (416) 785-2500, Ext. 2013.

Watch for your invitation to join in the opening celebrations.

Canada ends probe of Mossad passport affair

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Canada has ended its investigation of allegations that Israel broke a promise never again to use Canadian passports in spy operations.

Ottawa is satisfied Israel did not break a 1997 pledge that it would refrain from using the passports, and that it would no longer approach expatriate Canadians in Israel for their documents.

Canada has accepted Israel's assurances, "and there is no basis at this time to doubt them," Valerie Noftle, a spokesperson for the Foreign Affairs Department, told The CJN.

This was the second time the federal government probed Israel's use of Canadian passports in its secret missions. The first incident involved the bungled assassination attempt two years ago in Amman of Khaled Meshal, a key leader of Hamas. Two Mossad agents were found to be carrying forged Canadian passports.

The affair severely strained Canada-Israel relations. Ottawa recalled its ambassador to Israel, David Berger. Israel expressed regret, and then-prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu personally assured Canadian Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy that the Mossad would no longer use purloined or doctored Canadian documents in its missions.

But a short time later, allegations arose from Leslie Jacobs, a Canadian who's been living in Jerusalem since 1992, that he was approached by government officials who asked him for his passport.

Lewis said he had been contacted by agents of the Bureau of Immigrant Affairs, which intelligence officials believe is a Mossad front.

He said the agents also asked Lewis' daughter to fly to Canada, obtain a passport, return and hand it over.

It was the second time Lewis had been approached. In 1996, he gave his passport to Israeli agents, who said it would be used to bring Jews from oppressed countries to Israel. He obtained another one from the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv, where he was told never to give his passport to anyone again.

Lewis informed the embassy after the second time he was contacted. A Canadian diplomat interviewed him.

Axworthy ordered a new probe last November. Canadian officials found that the evidence given by Lewis was vague and inconclusive.

Noftle told The CJN that Canadian consular officials in Israel informed Lewis last spring that handing over a Canadian passport to anyone is a contravention of the law. She said Lewis signed a document agreeing he would not do it again, and that he would inform the embassy if he was ever approached again by Israeli officials.

Israeli authorities denied asking Lewis for his passport, and also denied that the Bureau of Immigrant Affairs existed.

As a result of the Meshal/Lewis affair, there is now a warning in Canadian passports, informing the bearer that selling the document "or permitting any other individual or agency to use [it] may lead to criminal prosecution and is cause for revocation of the passport and refusal of future passport services."

Not everyone believed that Canada's probe was sufficient or that Ottawa should take Israel at its word.

Recent published reports quoted unnamed Canadian intelligence officials as denouncing Canada's investigation as shoddy and incomplete. They said Canada simply did not want to upset Israel.

Shul council created

By MYRON LOVE

WINNIPEG — The creation of the Winnipeg Council of Synagogues was announced in mid-August.

Dr. Michael Helper, head of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's Multiple Appeals Commission (MAC), initiated the move to create this organization two years ago after the High Holy Day fundraising appeals.

"We found that, as we were meeting to address MAC issues, other synagogue-related issues also came up," says Steven Feldgaier, immediate past president of the Rosh Pina Synagogue and one of the original representatives on the synagogues committee formed to negotiate with MAC.

"We invited the city's other synagogues to join us, Feldgaier said. (Originally, only the major synagogues were involved.) "We have been pleased with the response."

The Winnipeg Council of Synagogues consists of 10 of Winnipeg's 11 congregations ranging from Chabad to Reform. Just one small Orthodox synagogue has held back.

"All the synagogues are feeling very positive about this initiative," Feldgaier said. "There is a lot of potential here for sharing concerns and reaching out to the community in a way that we haven't done in the past."

CJC national officer Marion Mayman presents a cheque for $18,000 to Turkish ambassador to Canada Erhan Ogut for earthquake relief.

CJC earthquake fund for Turkey hits $18,000

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Immediately following the recent earthquake in Turkey, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) established a special relief fund.

On Sept. 2, Marion Mayman, a CJC national officer, presented a cheque for $18,000 to Erhan Ogut, ambassador of Turkey to Canada, at his residence. Also present was Eric Vernon, director of government relations for CJC.

In presenting the cheque, Mayman explained to the ambassador the significance of the number 18 in Judaism. Because the number represents chai, or life, she said, it is a symbol of our wishes for Turkey's future.

The donation is "a small token of our concern for the people of Turkey, the money was raised by Jews from coast to coast. Its human suffering has touched our hearts," Mayman said.

In accepting the cheque, Ogut said, "This kind of [gesture] ... [illegible] ... appropriate manner."

Ogut said there are two components to rebuilding his country, the material and psychological. "Although the material aid is very important, this international solidarity is giving a moral boost and gives us the strength to rebuild the country," he said.

"I would like to convey my sincere thanks to the Jewish community in this country and to the Canadian Jewish Congress for what they have done. It is a great pleasure to see that we are not alone, that there are people who care."

Following the presentation, the ambassador handed Mayman a letter of thanks addressed to Moshe Ronen, national president of CJC.

CJC is part of a North American and British coalition of Jewish organizations actively raising funds and doing relief work in Turkey. The coalition is coordinated by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Those wishing to contribute to the Turkish Earthquake Relief Fund of CJC [illegible] ... Mayman ...

Hamilton Jews explore future of their community

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The UJA 2000 campaign was launched recently with a spirited discussion on whether the community here will survive the next millennium.

About 200 people attended the program at Beth Jacob Synagogue, but to the disappointment of the mostly senior audience, the generation they hoped to attract – young parents in their 40s – was only sparsely represented.

The four panelists, all young parents, were: award-winning farmer and Shalom Village president, Carl Loewith; Faigie Itkin, coordinator, with her husband Rabbi Zalman Itkin, of the Chabad Jewish Student Centre; lawyer Martin Halpern; and Wendy Schneider, editor of the Hamilton Jewish News.

The moderator was CBC radio and TV personality, Ralph Benmergui, who kept the discussion going at a brisk pace, with humor and the occasional provocative statement.

Lack of community involvement by the younger generation was the main concern expressed by all.

Principal reasons cited were the lack of programs to attract teens and young adults; changing family structures and the increase in two-income families, with both parents having demanding careers and no time for community involvement; little or no Jewish education beyond the elementary level; and the young leaving the community while no new families are settling here.

Some were disturbed at the lack of new leadership, while others lamented the fact that those who are involved often tend to retire at 65 because they feel they have done their share.

Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Temple Anshe Sholom, was more optimistic. When he first came here 50 years ago, the Hamilton Jewish community numbered 3,500, he noted. Today it stands at 5,000.

"We may be a small group," he said, "but we have many organizations; 85 percent belong to a shul, one of the highest affiliations in North America; because we are a smaller community, each one of us counts…Let's reach out to the younger people."

And, added Rabbi Baskin to applause, "we have to be more ecumenical, with Reform, Conservative and Orthodox all working together."

Talented young Israeli singer/performer Marina opened and closed the program with brief selections of Israeli songs. Welcoming remarks were made by campaign chair, Cele Steinberg, and other speakers included federation president Cheryl Greenbaum and executive director, Patricia Tolkin Eppel.

On behalf of Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS), Jewish social services chair, Jack Leon, made a special presentation of a JIAS scholarship for outstanding achievement in math, business and computer science at McMaster University and for his involvement with the McMaster Jewish Students Association to Steven Karan, who came here from Minsk in 1991.

Winnipeg CJA holds Super Week

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Instead of the traditional Super Sunday campaign this year, the Winnipeg Jewish community's annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign kicked off this year with a new concept – Super Week.

CJA executive director Gerry Koffman reports that the new idea proved successful in every way.

"We raised $132,000, an increase of 9 percent over last year's Super Sunday," Koffman reports. "We had close to 1,500 pledges compared to about 1,000 last year."

Super Week began on Aug. 29, and continued through Sept. 2. Calls by volunteers were made Sunday morning and during weekday evenings.

"We found an overwhelming ratio of phone calls to contacts," Koffman says. "Often, on Super Sundays, after lunch our callers found most people were out. This concept also made it easier to get volunteers because it was spread out over the week."

The campaign target is $3.25 million as compared to a little more than the $3 million raised last year. The Super Week phase of the campaign focuses on donors who traditionally give $400 or less.

Jewish fraternity members gather for convention

By GEOFFREY DUVINER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Swapping ideas and forming friendships were the focus of activities at Alpha Epsilon Pi's (AEPi) annual convention last month.

The largest Jewish fraternity in North America, AEPi had representatives from chapters across North America at its meeting in Morristown, N.J., Aug. 18 to 22, where the members shared tips on how to run a successful fraternity.

And, in the spirit of brotherhood, they formed bonds with fraternity brothers they had never met before.

The convention "created an atmosphere of caring and friendship unlike any convention I had been to before," said Josh Koziebrocki, one of five delegates from AEPi's University of Toronto chapter, Tau Omega.

Among last year's successes reported by Tau Omega were their role in helping organize a campus-wide clothing drive, packaging and delivering goods for a Passover food drive, volunteering to paint an elderly man's house and hosting community Shabbat dinners.

Koziebrocki, the chapter vice-president, won the Phillip Cohen Undergraduate Key, an award presented for social presence and academic achievment.

Harley Gold, the chapter's president, won an award for outstanding leadership.

The chapter won both the Outstanding Colony award for best startup chapter and the Outstanding Jewish Communal Activity award for most dedication to community service.

A small group of U of T students introduced the AEPi chapter in the fall of 1997 after a previous chapter had dwindled in the early '90s. Tau Omega now has 29 members.

Student volunteers in Israel

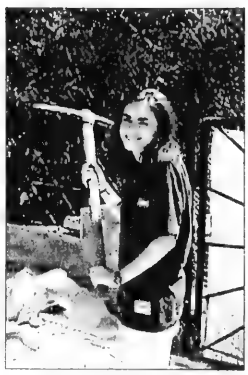
TORONTO — Naomi Cutler, 21, recently spent four weeks in Jerusalem doing community service through Livnot U'Lehibanot's volunteer program.

Cutler helped to paint and plaster three separate apartments, she dug in the tunnels under the Western Wall and she visited members of an senior citizens home.

"I felt a sense of accomplishment, painting and plastering," Cutler said. "It was good to see the apartments we were working on look better, and to witness how happy it made the people whose homes they were. I felt like I contributed to the community,

"It was also rewarding working in the tunnels with the regular Livnot participants. I was digging in historical areas which people would be looking at for years to come."

Cutler's roommate was an American volunteer. "We shared similar interests and would spend a lot of time together in the afternoons and evenings. I met many of her friends with whom I continued to have contact even after she went back to New Jersey," Cutler said.



Naomi Cutler

She described a typical day at the program. Up at 8:30 a.m., volunteers would leave with their foreman after breakfast for the apartment they were painting. They painted together for about three hours, with breaks and then picked up a falafel in town and returned to the Livnot campus.

In the afternoons and evenings, Cutler said, they would meet friends who were studying at the Hebrew University or chat with the participants in Livnot's regular programs.

On weekends, she generally visited family. She also spent a Shabbat at the Livnot campus in Safed.

Cutler recommends the volunteer program to anyone who wants to spend time in Jerusalem, meet great people, do worthwhile community service work and have time to pursue other interests. "I'm strongly considering coming back again some time next year," she said.

Cutler attended the Associated Hebrew Day Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. She is now entering her third year at the University of Toronto.

Netsky plays a central role in klezmer's revival

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Music has always played a part in the Jewish cultural experience. Recently, Jewish klezmer has re-emerged and is playing a part in the contemporary musical scene.

Ashkenaz '99

One of the central players at the core of this musical revival is Hankus Netsky, 44, founder of the Klezmer Conservatory Band (KCB). Netsky and the KCB opened this year's Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

"Klezmer music," according to Netsky, "is about communicating certain aspects of Jewish culture. It is about hearing my grandfather daven with a certain kind of kavanah (spiritual intention)."

Netsky, or Professor Klezmer, as he is known in his column in the Philadelphia Exponent, was born into a musical family – his grandfather and two uncles were musicians.

"While it wasn't a surprise that I became a musician, it wasn't considered a tremendous blessing," Netsky said.

"By sixth grade I was already organizing bands," he said. One of his first bands was the Olympians, which had its debut at the dedication of a new Torah for one of Philadelphia's small Orthodox synagogues.

Hankus Netsky

"I became enamored with Jewish music early on," he said. "I enjoyed good cantors and choir leaders, as well as religious and synagogue music. Later on, I also became interested in popular music and jazz.

"When I was 19, I went to one of my great-uncles and asked him about Jewish music. He had my great-grandfather's record collection and I realized that there was a great world out there. I started looking for anyone who would play this stuff with me."

In 1978, Netsky started teaching at the New England Conservatory of Music, after completing an undergraduate and a master's degree in classical composition. He discovered that other people were also interested in klezmer.

"There was a grass-roots reaction happening across the country, completely independently."

Jews and non-Jews were finding it through Balkan music, some through jazz, blues, and some through bluegrass music, Netsky said.

"I couldn't walk away from it, the community was clearly interested. Until this point, klezmer was a derogatory name for a musician who couldn't earn a living. Now it seemed that klezmer was a badge of honor."

In February 1980 he put together a group that had the instrumentation of a large 1920s band, the KCB.

"We were big, 15 pieces – all conservatory people, all creative. We produced a sound that was very different," Netsky said.

"Within a year, we made our first record, Yiddish Renaissance.

"At this point, I decided to become less involved with the jazz side of my life, and concentrate on [the klezmer] part of my career."

Since then, the band has produced several albums. They've been on Garrison Keillor's A Prairie Home Companion, a U.S weekly radio talk show. Netsky and the KCB appear on Itzhak Pearlman's In The Fiddler's House. Netsky also composed the music for Robin Williams' Fool and the Flying Ship, a children's video.

As for the different styles that are emerging in klezmer today, Netsky said that styles are no longer regional.

"It is not uncommon to find a band in New York playing small-town Romanian music.

"There are a lot of styles, they're all mixed up and they're everywhere. However, if people don't bother to learn the essence of the music, it will die out.

"I feel that it is my role to show how deep these roots are. That this is a secular, cultural expression of just being Jewish.

"There is a divide between the establishment Jewish culture and the new radical Jewish culture. I feel strongly about being a bridge between the two worlds."

Sophisticated elegance at 99 Avenue

Toronto's tony Yorkville area welcomes a magnificent residence titled 99 Avenue. Located within steps of Hazelton Lanes, this 12-storey condominium residence comprises just 76 suites, priced affordably. The building's handsome exterior speaks of European influences, while its rear features a waterfall design of stepped terraces which overlook a serene Japanese-style garden.

From the canopied front entrance through to the porte-cochère at the other side of the building, 99 Avenue is reminiscent of a boutique hotel. The concierge desk, staffed 24 hours, ensures that guests are properly greeted as they arrive. And, residents will be pampered by valet parking and daily laundry service.

Appealing to an array of lifestyles, the suites range in size from 714 to almost 3,000 sq. ft. and are priced from $238,900 to just over $1 million. Residences include 1, 2 and 3 bedrooms with the options of a den and an electric or gas fireplace, and spectacular ensuites that feaure a separate dressing room area with vanity sinks.

Every suite includes either a balcony, terrace or both, of up to 700 sq. ft, and rarer still, each home will be outfitted with a gas-line hook-up, some of which will extend to the balcony/terrace area to make outdoor cooking possible. As a special upgrade, terrrace suites can be fittted with outdoor gas heaters, and a power awning system for privacy and comfort during warm months.

One of the most exciting features of the suites is the stunning bistro kitchen. The most skilled gourmet will find it irresisitible, and the amateur will be inspired. To start with, the kitchen accommodates gas appliances which are not typically available in condominiums. Most feature a professional 30" DCS gas range, a brand name refrigerator, and a Bosch dishwasher, all with a sleek stainless steel finish, including the hood fan. The custom cabinetry and quality finishes offer a personal touch. Many kitchens feature breakfast bars and separate breakfast areas.

For more information about the building's innovative, high-tech infrastructure with fibre-optic backbone; Bell's Vista 450 telephone with wireless keyboard featuring e-mail capabilities, a standard feature in every suite; the business and recreational amenities; its professionally furbished digital movie theatre and so much more, please call (416) 926-9280.

Clinton expected to join Syria, Israel talks

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton is likely to intervene if mediation efforts by U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and her peace team fail to restart talks between Israel and Syria, American officials say.

According to sources in Washington, neither Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak nor Syrian President Hafez al-Assad is keen on their contacts with Albright and her peace team, which includes special Middle East envoy Dennis Ross. Both Barak and Assad feel that, at least for the decisive first step of renewing the talks, presidential action is needed.

The White House is apparently aware of this, and has hinted in recent days that Clinton is trying to achieve a comprehensive peace in the Middle East as a part of his legacy in the field of foreign policy. He is therefore likely to become directly involved in the process.

Washington sources are also saying that, in accordance with Barak's request, Albright and her team have focused primarily on negotiations with the Palestinians. Ross was to be in Israel this week for the ceremonial opening of the final status negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, and was to remain for a day or two.

Albright, the sources say, held "indecisive talks," with Assad in Damascus and with Barak in Washington. She intends to continue contacts with the two countries' foreign ministers, Syria's Farouk al Sharaa and Israel's David Levy, when the two arrive in New York for next week's UN General Assembly meeting.

At the State Department, officials are pointing out that Albright was never enthusiastic about shuttle diplomacy in the region, and prefers to conduct "diplomacy by telephone." The gaps between Syria and Israel, however, are likely to entail more extensive American involvement at a higher level.

Prof. William Quandt, an expert in government and foreign policy at the University of Virginia, said Assad is interested in the Golan Heights and in improved relations with the United States, "but nothing will move during Madeleine's visits."

Quandt, a past member of the National Security Council, said "Assad wants Clinton to be involved, and if Clinton wants things to happen during his term, Assad will work with him."

Judith Kipper, the director of the Middle East Forum at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington, also expressed misgivings about the U.S. peace team. "They simply can't do it alone," she claimed.

At this stage, sources in Washington are saying that there is still no shared basis for renewed talks. The situation leaves the Clinton Administration with two options. They can wait, while pressing Barak to announce his agreement to a full withdrawal from the Golan, as Assad is demanding before the talks are restarted; or they can help formulate arrangements to cover security and water, as Israel is requesting prior to the official resumption of negotiations. Such arrangements are likely to include demilitarization and alternative means of security to be provided by the United States.

U.S. President Bill Clinton

American concerns focus on the central question of whether Assad is truly ready for peace with Israel. Senior researchers close to the U.S. government are openly voicing these doubts.

"The Syrians have exaggerated their forces in the past, and for all we know, they'll miscalculate again," claimed Richard Hass, foreign policy research director at the Brookings Institution. "Barak wants a deal, but not at any price," he said.

Dr. Daniel Pipes of the University of Pennsylvania believes Assad is interested in the peace process, but not necessarily in peace itself.

"He'll always find an excuse to say no," Pipes said.

Final status negotiations set to start

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister David Levy and the chairman of the PLO executive committee, Abu Mazen, were to officially renew final status negotiations on Sept. 13 at the Erez Crossing.

The timetable stipulated in the Sharm el Sheikh agreement calls for a framework accord within five months and a comprehensive treaty within a year, by Sept. 13, 2000.

It is no coincidence that the reopening of final status talks was set for last Monday. Six years ago, on Sept. 13, 1993, Yitzhak Rabin and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat signed the first Oslo accord – the Declaration of Principles – on the White House lawn.

The final status negotiations had already begun in May 1996 at Taba, but the talks were a one-time event, cut off by the elections and Benjamin Netanyahu's ascent to power in Israel.

The event on Monday was intended to serve as a festive opening to negotiations, with speeches by Levy and Mazen. The foreign minister was expected to speak about Israel's commitment to reaching a final accord that will end the conflict and enable Palestinians and Israelis to be separated.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak said on the weekend: "I believe that it is possible to reach a framework accord within five months. There is an historic opportunity to try to put an end to the conflict and to march in the direction of peace and security."

Barak will decide today who will lead the negotiating team following the resignation of his original candidate for the job, attorney Gilad Sher. Levy and Mazen will meet later this week to conclude an agreement on the format for the talks.

The final status accord is intended to provide a solution for the three most difficult points of contention between Palestinians and Israelis: borders, refugees and Jerusalem.

Other central issues include the Palestinian state and its areas of sovereignty, security arrangements, the future of Jewish settlements, control of water resources and economic relations.

U.S. President Bill Clinton is expected to invite Barak and Arafat to Washington early next year to wrap up a framework accord. Barak believes that such an accord can help identify areas of agreement and dispute, without getting bogged down in details at the initial stage.

At the meeting this week, the Palestinians and Israelis were also scheduled to announce resumption of the work of the joint committees established under the interim accords.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat has expressed optimism that a final status agreement could be achieved within a year: "I believe it is possible. If the Israelis are interested in an historic reconciliation, they're aware of the timetable."

The Israelis "must also realize that the eastern part of Jerusalem is occupied and they must carefully read United Nations Security Council Resolution 194, which pertains to the refugees," he added.

Israeli court bans interrogation method

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Human rights groups are hailing an end to Israel's use of interrogation methods they say are tantamount to torture.

Israel's High Court of Justice last week barred the Shin Bet domestic security service from using physical force when questioning prisoners.

In its decision, the panel of nine justices unanimously ruled that the Shin Bet had no right to use the interrogation methods, which had been applied over the years to thousands of Palestinian detainees suspected of terrorist activity against Israel.

Yossi Beilin

The decision, written by Chief Justice Aharon Barak, said these methods included violent shaking, sleep deprivation and placing detainees in uncomfortable positions for prolonged periods.

The court, in accepting the seven petitions filed by human rights groups, rejected the conclusions of a government-appointed commission eight years ago, which gave the General Security Service authority to exert "moderate physical force" in certain situations.

In its decision, the court said it recognized the special security concerns of the country, but concluded that in a democracy such as Israel, humiliating and painful interrogation methods are unacceptable. The court left room for the Knesset to legislate on the matter.

Attorney Avigdor Feldman, who submitted one of the petitions, welcomed the ruling.

"For many years we have waged our battle," he told reporters. "We lost many times, but for once we have won."

Political reaction to the ruling was mixed. Supporters of the decision hailed it as a beacon for democratic rule in Israel.

Critics expressed concern that the tough measures used by the security service were intended for "ticking bombs," the term used for detainees suspected of having information that could prevent an imminent terrorist attack.

"I am very proud of the decision," Justice Minister Yossi Beilin told reporters.

He said he hopes the decision "will allow in the future for the security services to deal with special and extraordinary situations to prevent a situation of a ticking bomb."

Centre party Knesset member Dan Meridor, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee and a former Likud justice minister, also welcomed the ruling.

Deputy Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh expressed concern that it could damage state security.

Likud Knesset member Gideon Ezra, a former deputy head of the Shin Bet, said that in the wake of the ruling, he was sure the security service was already trying to come up with other ways to obtain the information it required. Ezra denied that Shin Bet officials had used the methods liberally, or that they caused undue discomfort.

The ruling came amid heightened security in Israel in preparation for possible terrorist attacks before the High Holy Days and in the wake of two car bomb attacks recently in Tiberias and Haifa in which an Israeli woman was wounded and the three perpetrators killed.

Israel aids Greece

This is the second time that an Israeli unit has come to the rescue after an earthquake struck Greece. In 1953, Israel dispatched help after the entire island of Cephalonia was razed by a temblor.

At that time, a ship belonging to the still-young Israeli navy was on manoeuvres in the Mediterranean and headed for the island, arriving even before Greek officials were able to send help.

The Greek government honored that effort earlier this year.

The Week in Israel

Sept 6

• Police arrested five people suspected of involvement in two car bomb attacks that occurred on Sunday in Tiberias and Haifa. (Subsequently it was established that Israeli Arabs were involved, with the probable instigation and support of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.)

• Ariel Sharon, 72, was confirmed as leader of the Likud party.

Sept. 7

• Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh met with Jewish settler leaders to show them maps indicating the portions of the West Bank from which Israel will withdraw in the first of the Wye 2 redeployments.

Sept. 8

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak indicated he would support legislation aimed at softening a landmark Supreme Court ruling barring the use of force by the Shin Bet during interrogation of prisoners. "There must be an authority that can, in the hour of need, work quickly…to approve the necessary investigation in the case of immediate danger," the premier said in a statement. The court's ruling was supported by both the justice and public security ministers.

Sept. 9

• Security officials released 199 Palestinian prisoners, reviving the peace process after nearly a year of stalemate. None of the prisoners had been convicted of killing Israelis.

• Security officials imposed a closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip before the start of Rosh Hashanah. The closure came after the Palestinian Authority warned that terrorist groups may try to carry out a suicide attack in one of the cities.

Sept. 10

• The strike by nearly 100,000 municipal workers, which lasted nearly eight days, ended.

• Israel's population on the eve of Rosh Hashanah 5760 totals 6,145,000 of whom 4,847,000 are Jews; 922,000 Muslims; and 376,000 Druze, Christians and others.

Art Eggleton makes his third visit to Israel

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Minister of National Defence Art Eggleton made a short visit to Israel last week as part of a six-day tour that included Jordan and Syria.

It was Eggleton's third trip to Israel. The first trip was in 1991, shortly after he completed 11 years as Toronto's longest serving mayor.

"My first visit was in an unofficial capacity," he told The CJN. "I came here with the Canadian Jewish Congress after retiring from being mayor of Toronto. I managed to see a considerable amount of Israel.

"Then I came as trade minister in 1997 to inaugurate the Canada/Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA), signed just a few months before with Natan Sharansky.

"I understand that we are doing quite well in terms of trade increases, about 30 percent, and I am happy to see that happen.

"Now I am back in a new role, as Minister of Defence."

Eggleton had intended to come to the region earlier in the year to commemorate the 25th anniversary of UNDOF (United Nations Disengagement Observer Force) which has had Canadian participation since its inception, but he had to reschedule his visit to the force, based on the Golan Heights, due to the Kosovo conflict.

"The command of UNDOF is now with General Ross, a Canadian, and there have been Canadians on the Heights for all 25 years," explained Eggleton.

"We have only about 200 [Canadians] there now, but over the course of the 25 years some 20,000 Canadian Force members have participated."

Speaking of his meeting with Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who also holds Israel's defence portfolio, Eggleton said, "On meeting with Mr. Barak last evening he indicated how strongly he felt about proceeding with peace talks, not only with the Palestinians on final status negotiations, but with Syria and the Lebanese.

"There is a very strong determination, I gathered, on his part to move ahead.

"Of course, Canada has a considerable interest in the area; not only have we been involved with UNDOF over the past 25 years, we have also been involved in peacekeeping here as long as peacekeeping has been around in the Middle East.

"This time also appears to be opportune inasmuch as the Wye 2 agreement has just been signed and there is considerable focus on Israel's new prime minister and government.

Asked if Canadian peacekeepers might potentially have a pivotal role in Southern Lebanon when Israeli troops pull out from the region, Eggleton said, "I have asked both Prime Minister Barak and Lt. General [Shaul] Mofaz, [IDF Chief of Staff], about that very question.

"At this stage I don't think that they have a notion as to how that might be done, whether that might be needed or not.

He said that if the Golan Heights does go back to Syria, what would be needed on the border would be a UN defence force.

"So, there are potential areas, but it's still very early and the process of the peace talks will determine how [Canada] might fall in.

"In any case, we would have to look at that situation at the time, in terms of our capabilities to provide troops for such a mission, as we have troops today in 22 different parts of the world.

"But, let me say that we have obviously demonstrated over a great number of years our interest in the Middle East – to bring peace, security, prosperity to the people of Israel and the people who are in the neighborhood of Israel."

Eggleton, who was to go directly on to Jordan and Syria, was asked if he was taking any specific message to the Syrians.

"I'll certainly be telling them that Israel wants to start peace talks; it's a very clear message I received from the leadership here.

"The Israelis have not asked me in a formal way to convey this message, but I will do so, just as Madeleine Albright did a few days ago when she was in Syria."

The minister was asked to comment on recent reports that Canadian citizens living in Israel are still being asked to provide Canadian passports to the Mossad.

"I have heard nothing about this," responded Eggleton. "The former [Israeli] government, on two occasions, made it quite clear that the government did not support any misuse of Canadian passports and would make sure that this does not happen again. To the best of my knowledge it hasn't, but it doesn't come in my purview as defence minister."

Summing up, Eggleton said, "I am very keenly interested in our relationship with Israel.

"Back home I represent a constituency where a great number of Jewish people have a big interest in what happens in Israel, and I do too.

"We want to do what we can to help bring peace and security to this area, so we will continue to make our contribution. Israel has a good friend in Canada."

Shin Bet urges govt. response to Islamic Movement

BY AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – The Shin Bet will recommend that the government implement harsh measures against the Islamic Movement in Israel.

A senior security official told Ha'aretz that the proposed recommendations are in response to recent attempted terror attacks in Haifa and Tiberias perpetrated by three Israeli Arab members of the Islamic Movement. They were killed when their car bombs detonated prematurely.

The above-mentioned official, said, "The Islamic Movement must be made to understand that all the red lines have been crossed here."

The investigation regarding the two car bombs that went off earlier this month revealed that members of the Islamic Movement were deeply involved in terrorist activity and had close contacts with the Hamas movement in the territories.

"If until now we thought that the members of the movement involved in terrorism were merely exceptions, we now realize that we were wrong," the senior security source said.

"The movement can no longer say that it did not sow the seeds of violence.

"We must treat these two attacks as if they had succeeded and we had been faced with dozens of casualties and hundreds of wounded. What would have happened had the two cars exploded simultaneously in busy centres just before the holiday and right after the signing of the Sharm al-Sheikh accord?

"It is hard for me to estimate whether the peace process would have continued and what the impact on the relationship between the state and its Arab citizens would have been."

The key figure in the group, according to investigations, was Imam Amir Masalha of the village of Dabouriyeh, who studied in religious institutions affiliated with the Hamas on the West Bank.

Over the last year he visited Jordan several times, returning from there only several days before embarking on his attempted suicide mission in Tiberias. Masalha, like his two accomplices who were killed, had close ties with the leaders of the Israeli Islamic Movement. Leading figures in the movement, as well as several Arab members of Knesset, attended the funerals of the three men.

"On the visionary plain, the Islamic Movement still supports the destruction of the State of Israel, even if it does not believe that this should be accomplished by means of a Jihad," the security source said.

"They work to change society by means of preaching and education. The final goal is a religious Islamic state in which the Jews are a minority."

He added that the leaders of the movement were in close contact with the Hamas in the territories. "They are very welcome guests at the home of Sheikh Ahmed Yassin and at Hamas rallies in Gaza."

The senior official refused to say whether he supports outlawing the Islamic Movement. "It is a difficult dilemma. I also doubt whether it is legally possible.

"The significant question is how the Islamic movement will now interpret the recent events."

Shas backs down from leaving coalition

By YAIR SHELEG AND YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Shas party has decided to give Prime Minister Ehud Barak more time to resolve the crisis over covering the deficit in the party's educational system.

The decision was a reversal of declarations made by party members before Rosh Hashanah, according to which Shas would bolt the coalition if sums to pay the overdue salaries of school employees were not immediately delivered.

The party's Council of Torah Sages, which had been scheduled to meet today in order to decide on the departure from the coalition, are now not planning to convene. Shas has refrained from officially declaring the time-extension in the hopes that Barak will not prolong the crisis.

According to sources in Shas, party leaders had accepted the agreement of Finance Minister Avraham Shochat and Minister Without Portfolio Haim Ramon to transfer NIS 6 million for the payment of the employees' salaries.

This came after the Shas school system agreed several weeks earlier to the government's ratification of only minimum commitments. But the agreement was sabotaged by Education Minister Yossi Sarid, who had not been party to it.

Likewise, Shas personnel were also demanding the sum of NIS 14-16 million for the payment of their salaries, and were also not prepared to sign the agreement.

Shas members are still demanding of Barak that he carry out his promise to relinquish Sarid of his authority in the matter, and to take it upon himself to transfer the money for the salaries – separate from the discussions on the long-term rehabilitation program for Shas' educational network.

Discussions between Shas and the Finance and Education Ministries on transferring the money for workers' salaries will be renewed today.

The main difference is the demand of the Education Ministry to budget the funds for the network according to the number of students, and not the number of classrooms, as Shas is requesting.

Sources close to the prime minister are blaming Shas for the breakdown in the talks. According to them, there was an agreement to transfer NIS 12 million already on Friday morning, but Shas representatives refused to sign a commitment to discuss the method of allocating funds, for the network and the network's large deficit, within the next 45 days.

In a Thursday night meeting with Shas members held at the offices of the defence minister, which was attended, among others, by Shochat, Ramon, and Sarid, the participants reached agreement on the formula for the obligations to be submitted to Shas.

The prime minister said that he didn't want to destroy the Shas educational system, and that he wanted to give it another chance to reform itself, through the monitoring, control, and accompaniment of an authorized accountant, as was proper in such cases.

According to Barak, every suspicion of improper management and excess must be investigated by senior officials of the network, but that every administrative body that fails such a test deserves a second opportunity.

At a certain point in the talks Shas representatives told Barak: "Either Sarid or Shas." Barak rejected the threat and proposed that Shas sign an agreement.

Wye II at a glance

BY MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The Israeli-Palestinian agreement signed recently in the Egyptian resort of Sharm el-Sheik comes after a 10-month suspension of the peace process. The accord, known as Wye II because it revises the Wye accord signed last October, includes the following provisions:

- Israel will hand over 11 percent, or some 230 square miles, of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority in three withdrawals. The first is slated to take place in the coming days, followed by further withdrawals on Nov. 15 and Jan. 20.
- Negotiations for a final Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement will begin after the first withdrawal. The two sides will reach a framework outlining the agreement by mid-February and sign the completed agreement a year from now.
- Israel will release 200 Palestinian prisoners in the coming days and an additional 150 in October. The two sides agree to negotiate additional releases.
- The Palestinian Authority agrees to co-operate with Israel in the war against terrorism.
- The Palestinian Authority agrees to implement specific security steps, including the collection of illegal weapons and apprehending terror suspects. It also agrees to provide Israel with a list of all Palestinian police officials.
- Israel agrees to allow the Palestinian Authority to begin construction of a Gaza seaport on Oct. 1.
- Israel agrees to open on Oct. 1 the first of two safe-passage routes for Palestinians travelling between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Guide offers info, support for women dealing with assault

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The second edition of Guide to Services for Assaulted Women in Ontario, published by Community Information Toronto, with the support of the Ontario Association of Interval and Transition Houses and other community groups, is now available.

The guide, which offers information and support to women dealing with emotional, physical or sexual assault, was written specifically for women in abusive situations, but is also a resource for people who work with them.

The first part of the 120-page guide contains suggestions on the steps abused women can take to change their lives and those of their children. There are descriptions of services available, including basic legal information.

The second section has province-wide listings of shelters and crisis lines; hospital-based emergency services for victims of physical and sexual assault; victim services and court support programs; domestic violence courts; cultural interpreter services; women's centres; community information centres; and distress centres.

Also included in the guide are definitions of various types of abuse including physical or sexual assault, psychological and emotional abuse, stalking or financial abuse.

Jean Greenberg, senior information officer with Community Information Toronto, who co-ordinated the guide, says a Toronto guide has been available for several years, but there seemed to be a need for one for women living across the province. The first province-wide edition came out about one year ago. "There has been tremendous feedback to the book, which shows there is a need.

"So many women who are abused and isolated do not reach out for services. If they can find this guide, they may become reassured that help is available. It could be a first step."

It is important, she said, for women to realize that they are not alone. "We hope [they] will use the information in this guide to begin to make a change. [They] don't need to think about everything at once. Maybe the first step is getting information, or starting to think differently."

The guide is available in English and French by calling the order desk of Community Information Toronto at 392-4575 or toll-free from outside Toronto at 1-800-836-3238.

Home care cuts to impact on community

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The provincial government's underfunding of home care will have a serious impact on the Jewish community, said Al Gorlick, chair of the Alliance of Seniors to Protect Canada's Social Programs.

He was referring to reports that the number of hours of home care has been cut by at least 50 percent and that it is now being restricted to people who require help in bathing and dressing. The cutback means most people will be unable to get help for cleaning and cooking.

Gorlick said the alliance is concerned that the government is travelling the route of giving contracts for home care to for-profit agencies who pay $2 an hour less to their employees than not-for-profit groups.

"But aside from the level of care, we are very concerned that the underfunding has resulted in the number of hours being cut," he said.

In the last three months, the government has given contracts for home care to private agencies, a move that has hurt the Victorian Order of Nurses (VON), St. Elizabeth Nurses and Circle of Care, Gorlick said.

The difficulties arose when the government ruled that the pay scales of not-for-profit agencies had to be comparable to that of hospital employees doing similar work.

"But the private agencies did not have to meet pay equity rules and they are paying lower wages," he said. "The VON and other agencies like it are being hit by the private sector hiring nurses on a contract basis."

Referring to another type of assistance in the home, namely help for the caregiver, Canada's Association for the Fifty-Plus (CARP), a group representing seniors, has asked the federal government to make changes in the current law.

People who quit jobs to care for old or frail family members deserve government compensation, a representative of the association said.

The association called for an amendment to the Canada Health Act extending public funding to home care services in the same way as hospital and physician services are publicly covered. It also asked for home-based training for informal caregivers.

According to Statistics Canada, nearly three million Canadians were providing informal care in 1995, the most recent year for which such statistics are available.

"One way or another, every family is going to be touched by informal care," said Lillian Morgenthau, president of CARP.

But most families aren't prepared for the overwhelming demands such care entails, she said.

Real-life dramas filmed at Sick Kids Hospital

By NICOLE SALAMA
Student Intern

TORONTO — Life and death scenarios in hospitals are depicted in many television dramas.

Now, a new Canadian series will document real-life dramas. Entitled Little Miracles, the series takes a look inside Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children. It debuts on the Life Network on Sept. 20 at 8 p.m.

According to the show's executive producer, Ira Levy of Breakthrough Entertainment, the purpose of the series is to reveal "compelling stories about ordinary people and how they find the strength to come to terms with adversity in a crisis situation."

Barri Cohen

The stories range from that of a little girl in a coma after an accident to one about a young man's broken thumb.

The series is co-produced by Breakthrough and HATASA-Wychwood Park Productions Inc.

Breakthrough has produced numerous documentaries including The Riot at Christie Pits. As well, the company produces the children's series Dudley the Dragon and the cooking show, What's for Dinner.

The CJN was invited to view a rough cut of the first episode of Little Miracles, which had the working title Kaitlyn's Journey and Stephanie's Fear. Each episode highlights two true medical stories.

The CJN also spoke with Ron Singer, another of the series' executive producers (from HATASA-Wychwood Park) and Barri Cohen, one of the directors.

Because of the time spent with the children and their families, the crew are sometimes emotionally affected by the stories they film, Cohen said. As one of the directors, she is particularly at risk, and noted that she "tends to get very involved and knows it has changed her but not how."

Singer says there are "so many special kids [at the hospital]." Consequently, choosing which stories to portray is difficult. For Levy, stories must "have a number of elements: a good story for people to follow, an interesting situation, consent and timing – [because you] can't control real life."

The Hospital for Sick Children was chosen specifically because there are "many medical programs involving adults but few with children, and there is a crucial difference between adult and children's hospitals," said Singer.

After watching some of the children, their families and the doctors who care for them, Cohen noticed that "little miracles" occur on a daily basis.

She says the "character of the hospital is aggressive; [it] never quits and has a 'can do' attitude." The hospital never gives up, and Cohen sees the staff as nurturing and the hospital as a "friendly environment for children and their families."

Not only does the production team want to focus on the special stories that occur daily at the hospital, Cohen also wants to "demystify a lot of the things that are scary about hospitals and show intimate human interaction between families and strangers [hospital staff]."

Singer said that because the show deals with sensitive topics and real medical procedures, consent and respect for the children and their families are paramount. It is important that the show is "not voyeuristic, not just entertainment."

People might think a show filmed at a children's hospital will be depressing, but the goal of the series is to appeal to people's emotions and leave them "with a sense of hope," Levy said.

In Cohen's opinion, this inspiration comes from the "every day courage and heroism of people in general, of all ages."

Joy of Yiddish word

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Let me come close to the joy of the Yiddish word."

This is the first line spoken in Diamonds in the Dark, a presentation at Ashkenaz by A Traveling Jewish Theatre of San Francisco.

It is from a poem written in 1961 by Jacob Glatstein, an American Jew from Poland who died in 1971. The line is a lyrical tribute to a vanishing language and an endangered culture, which is the raison d'être of Diamonds in the Dark.

It is unfortunate, in this reviewer's opinion, that the show's program flyer does not list anything about the Yiddish writers except the titles of their poems.

This would have helped the audience in the Premiere Theatre to have a context for the fine work done by Naomi Newman, Corey Fischer and Albert Greenberg, the ensemble trio that authored and performed the play.

The interpretation of these poems was done in an avant garde style to the background of post-modern music, and required acute listening, an understanding of new theatre styles, and an appreciation of how these artists attempted to relate the content to today's world.

This was not always easy to do, especially when English and Yiddish lines (in translation) followed quickly, one after another. The beauty of the poems was sometimes not realized, as they might have been if given completely in Yiddish, in some cases.

The content was impressive. In Crazy Levi, by Canadian Rachel Korn, the actors tell the story of a bedraggled Jew who wanders the back roads telling his plight at being turned down by the daughter of the town's leading citizen. "Why don't you find a woman who will do your laundry and your cooking like the rest of your people do," tease Polish peasant women on the roads.

But Levi disappears, never to walk the roads again, and dogs sniff in vain for his tracks.

Told in a poetic setting, the story of the Yiddish poet who comes to America and must learn English, and thus becomes lost between two languages, is very touching. As one actor puts it, "language is the homeland."

Also well done is Fischer's solo on being alone and forgotten, and his contribution to the piece in which a husband stares out into the night but can't find words to tell his wife, who sits nearby, that he loves her.

An audience favorite was Jazz, by A. Lutski, in which the performers mimicked jazz instruments and sang rapid-fire lyrics, perhaps denoting the young Jew of today. Greenberg stood out in this and wrote music for it.

Newman gave a strong performance in A Few Words in the Mother Tongue by American writer Irena Klepfisz, illustrating the choices that a woman has in life.

All in all, Diamonds in the Dark was only partly successful in showing how rich a resource Yiddish poetry is, at least to this Toronto audience. It was, as Ashkenaz promised, theatre for the future.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5760, Eye On Arts presents its annual survey of what some people in the literary community are reading.

Lilian Nattel

Toronto-based writer Lilian Nattel, author of the internationally acclaimed first novel The River Midnight, is reading The Penguin Book of International Women's Stories (edited by Kate Figes, 1996), a collection that "is exposing me to writers I haven't read before, many from countries in the Middle East and Asia who aren't as well known to us in Canada and the United States."

The stories are "generally very good," Nattel reports, adding that she is particularly impressed with Irene Dische's story, The Jewess.

"It's about a German Jew whose family assimilated to the point of conversion. He goes back to Germany to claim an inheritance and encounters a Jewish woman who knew his father very well. It takes place about 15 or 20 years after the Holocaust. I'm enjoying it very much."

* * *

Montreal Yiddish writer Yehuda Elberg is presently "refreshing himself" with Crime and Punishment by Fyodor Dostoyevsky, a work that he first read many years ago. More than one critic has noted Dostoyevsky's influence on Elberg's novel The Empire of Kalman the Cripple and his other literary creations. It is an association Elberg proudly acknowledges.

"I greatly admire Dostoyevsky's writing. He is the founder of psychoanalysis – Freud said, 'I didn't invent psychoanalysis, I learned about it from the great novelists,' and he mentioned Dostoyevsky and Tolstoy.

"I don't think anyone has managed yet to write a psychoanalytical book as great as one of Dostoyevsky's novels. He didn't write psychoanalytical books, he wrote fiction. But you can check his books with a modern textbook of psychoanalysis and they will fit. If they don't fit, it's because there's something wrong with the textbooks."

Cuba Libre, a recent book by American mystery writer Elmore Leonard, is presently occupying the attention of Toronto novelist/lawyer Morley Torgov.

"I adore him," Torgov says exuberantly about Leonard. "Normally, I don't read Agatha Christie or other types of mystery-suspense thrillers, but Elmore Leonard is in a class by himself.

"At Harbourfront a few years ago, he said one of the cleverest things I've ever heard from any author. An interviewer asked him, 'To what do you attribute the success of your prose?' and he answered, 'I leave out the parts that people don't read.' That's the best piece of advice I've ever heard from an author."

Torgov, whose most recently-published novel is The War to End All Wars, is currently finishing a new book.

The Reader, a novel by Bernhard Schlink (Random House, English translation 1998) is "a very important book," says Toronto Yiddishist Shirley Kumove.

"Schlink is a German lawyer and judge, not Jewish, and he writes about the generation of Germans after the Holocaust. He looks at the post-Holocaust generation who are carrying on their shoulders the guilt of their parents and grandparents, and he's showing how they come to terms with it."

Kumove's second collection of pithy Yiddish folk sayings, More Words More Arrows, was published recently by Wayne State University Press. She is currently preparing a third volume of Yiddish phrases for publication.

Two literary titles are currently holding the attention of Cary Fagan, the Toronto-based author of Felix Roth and other novels. American writer Joseph Skibell's A Blessing On The Moon is "a strong and magical work, a realist novel set during the war. It deals with a lot of Jewish folk traditions, yet it's very modernist in its approach."

Fagan is also reading Into the Looking-Glass Wood (Knopf, 1998), a collection of essays by Alberto Manguel, the Argentinean-born writer and critic who lives in Canada. "I've always been glad that he's decided to make Canada his home. I think he's brought an international perspective to writing and reading that we previously lacked."

One of Manguel's essays, Fagan notes, is entitled On Being Jewish.

German diarist Victor Klemperer's book I Will Bear Witness: A Diary of the Nazi Years 1933, 1941 (Random House, trans. by Martin Chalmers, 1998) helps illuminate the question of why Jews didn't leave Germany when things got bad in the 1930s, according to Montreal poet Robyn Sarah.

"As things got worse and worse, the book allowed me to understand how a person might not try to leave until it was too late. There's that false hope, and to condemn that hope would be inhumane…

"I had the sense as I went through the book that he's like an animal caught in car headlights. There's a paralysis that sets in. You see something coming and you say, 'Maybe it won't hit me, maybe I'll wait it out. And anyways, if it does hit me, I won't have to worry. That's the end.'"

Sarah's most recent publication is Questions About the Stars, a collection of poems.

Award-winning Israeli film screened at Toronto festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Strangely enough, Jonathan Sagall's first feature, Urban Feel, elicited reactions which broadly echo its theme.

"My film deals with the double facetedness of life," said Sagall, a dual Canadian-Israeli citizen whose movie was recently screened at the Montreal World Film Festival. This week, Urban Feel will be shown at the Toronto International Film Festival.

A corrosive drama about shifting relationships set in contemporary Israel, Urban Feel won first prize at last year's Haifa International Film Festival and two awards from the Israeli Academy of Motion Pictures.

It also aroused the ire of haredim. Offended by its sexually explicit scenes, they ripped the film's posters to shreds outside Tel Aviv's Cinematheque.

"I don't think it's a controversial film," said Sagall, a 41-year-old actor, screenwriter and director who was born in Toronto and who divides his time between Israel and Canada.

"When I wrote the script, I simply wanted to tell a mayseh," he said, using the Yiddish word for a story.

Sagall, who directed and stars in Urban Feel, was able to make it thanks in part to a $600,000 grant from The Fund for the Promotion of Israeli Quality Films, an Israeli government agency.

But he doubts whether he could have finished it without additional financing from the Israel Film Theatres Association and Keshet Broadcasting, a privately-owned cable TV station.

"Making a film in Israel is a long and strenuous battle," explained Sagall, who was a staff writer on Sesame Street, the American children's television program which was transplanted in Israel as a bilingual Hebrew-Arabic production. "It took years of rewriting and lobbying."

Sagall, whose original career goal was to be a marine biologist, went into show business after landing the lead role in Lemon Popsicle, a successful Israeli film series.

After Lemon Popsicle – an adolescent comedy – ran its course, Sagall popped up in two Hollywood movies – George Roy Hill's Little Drummer Girl and Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List, in which he played the role of Poldek Pfefferberg, a black marketeer who sells Oskar Schindler contraband goods.

Sagall made his directorial debut in the mid-1980s with two shorts. Zenach Lipshitz's Last Little Vacation was inspired by a J.D. Salinger story. At Home was based on the life of gay British playwright Joe Orton.

Jonathan Sagall and Dafna Rechter in Urban Feel.

Meanwhile, at the Habimah National Theatre in Tel Aviv, he appeared in plays by Joshua Sobol and Franz Kafka.

Sagall and his younger sister, Naomi, an architect in Haifa, spent their formative years in Toronto. His father, Baruch, now a retired Haifa University philosophy professor, pursued postgraduate degrees at the University of Toronto. Ruth, his mother, is an actress. She is associated with the Haifa Municipal Theatre.

In Toronto, Sagall lived in Willowdale and studied at the Associated Hebrew Day Schools. One of his classmates, Isaac Barzilay, is an orthodontist today.

At the age of 11, his parents returned to Haifa. Sagall struggled to adjust to what essentially, for him, was a new country. "It was a very horrible time for me," he said.

After graduating from the Reali School, he was inducted into the army. He does not care to discuss this experience. "All I can say is that I wasn't a very good soldier."

Upon being demobilized, he briefly studied English and French literature at Haifa University, but it was not for him. He found his true calling in London, enrolling at the Guildhall School of Music and Drama.

Currently, Sagall is trying to round up funds for Lipstikonn, a thriller he wrote and plans to direct. It's about two Holocaust survivors who run into each other decades after World War II has ended.

Sagall is also adapting Hugo Asparagus for the screen, a series of short stories concerning Jewish and Arab relationships he originally wrote for Rosh Ehad, an Israeli weekly magazine.

In retrospect, he is generally satisfied with the arc of his career so far. Yet he has no illusions. As Sagall put it in his best hardboiled fashion: "Expect the worst and hope for the best."

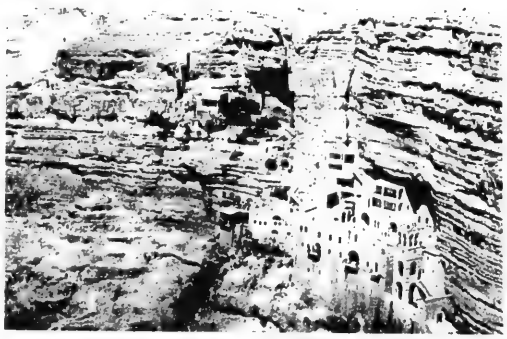
Visiting Wadi Kelt is an unforgettable experience

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter



Wadi Kelt, with view of St. George monastery.

WADI KELT — Carved into the rocky crevices of the stark Judean Desert, Wadi Kelt is an awesome sight.

Running from the outskirts of Jerusalem to the edges of Jericho, this gorge has attracted visitors since time immemorial.

During the Roman era, Christian heretics fleeing persecution sought shelter in its network of caves, most of which seem inaccessible.

Today, hikers imbued with an adventurous spirit are drawn to its rugged vistas.

The Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel offers trips to Wadi Kelt from Tel Aviv and Jerusalem every Monday. Last month, I joined one of them.

On this morning, the weather was particularly hot. When our group reached the starting point at about 11 a.m., the temperature was already in the mid-30s. As a result, our guide announced that the hike would be shortened to two or three hours.

The news initially disappointed me, since I had hoped to complete the entire circuit. But shortly after we got started, I realized that I had been a little too eager. As we descended into the ravine, the sheer limestone cliffs closing in on us, I concluded that the guide had been right.

My first view of Wadi Kelt was from a lookout guarded by three heavily-armed Israeli soldiers. Peering over the edge of an abyss, I caught a glimpse of one of its famous sights, the monastery of St. George of Koziba, clinging precariously to the walls of the canyon.

Originally a spiritual refuge for hermits, St. George was hewn out of the rocks more than 1,500 years ago. Destroyed by Persian invaders, it was restored by the Crusaders.

Having fallen into a state of disrepair by the mid-19th century, St. George was renovated to its former splendor in a project lasting from 1878 to 1901.

Distinguished by three sky-blue cupolas, St. George is a sprawling complex, set off by graceful cypress trees, lush gardens and orchards laden with citrus, figs, dates and bananas.

It is an oasis in a barren wilderness, remarkably like St. Catherine's monastery in the Sinai Peninsula.

Inside the cool, silent premises, patrolled by lean, hungry cats, a Greek Orthodox monk greeted us in Hebrew.

"Shabbat Shalom," he called out, his flowing brown ponytail cascading down his black cassock. He offered us a cold drink in exchange for a modest donation.

Leading us on a brief tour, he pointed out a presumably priceless collection of sombre icons affixed to the walls. Next, he drew our attention to the mummified remains of St. George, who lies undisturbed in a casket.

As we left the monastery, we were accompanied by a young Israeli man, a recently demobilized soldier with a rifle slung around his shoulder.

He was there to protect us from trigger-happy Arab marauders. In the past few years, several Israeli hikers here have been murdered by nationally-motivated Arab youths. In the immediate aftermath of the Six Day War, Palestinian infiltrators from Jordan fought gun battles with Israeli troops in Wadi Kelt. And in one such battle, on Dec. 10, 1968, an Israeli colonel was felled.

Of late, though, Wadi Kelt has been quiet, but precautions are still the order of the day. Hence our armed guard.

Fortunately, the day unfolded uneventfully and we were able to concentrate on the spectacular scenery along the winding trail.

The rock formations, eroded over the centuries by the elements, were particularly striking.

This being the height of the summer, the floor of the wadi was bone-dry. But in winter and early spring, flash floods roar through the wadis without warning, washing away everything in their path.

As the afternoon wore on, I felt the scalding heat still more keenly. It was at least 40 degrees celsius as we approached Jericho, supposedly the oldest city in the world.

Thirst was never a problem. On the advice of experts, I had two bottles of spring water in my knapsack. I drank copiously and never felt dehydrated.

From afar, Jericho was an expanse of green against the backdrop of Jordan's brown, hazy Moab mountain range. Emerging from Wadi Kelt, we stopped to examine the ruins of King Herod's winter palace, which is still being excavated.

As we got closer to Jericho, the first city in the West Bank to be relinquished to the Palestinians under the Oslo accords, we heard the plaintive moan of a meuzzin from a mosque.

It seemed like a fitting end to a jaunt in Wadi Kelt.

Smashnova flees Russia to pursue tennis

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Stories of abuse have become an issue among young women competing on the pro women's tennis circuit.

That was the case for Russian born tennis prodigy, Anna Smashnova, who competed recently at the $1 million du Maurier Canadian Open tennis championships held at York University.

In Smashnova's case, the abuse did not come from her parents, but from her country. Despite being Russia's number one ranked junior player in 1986, Anna and her family were denied access to good housing and jobs because they were Jews.

"My family were victims of discrimination. When we took a bus to travel, we were forced to sit only in the back," recalled Smashnova.

"We got sick and tired of the years of harassment. My father applied for emigration to Israel so that we could live freely as Jews."

Since the Smashnovas emigrated to Israel in 1990, what seemed to be a fairy tale come true. Anna's father, Sasha, worked as an engineer and her brother, Yura, became a computer engineer.

Smashnova became Israel's best woman tennis player when she won the French Open junior tennis championship at age 14 in 1991.

Smashnova continued her rise in tennis, defeating top stars Jana Novotna, Lori McNeil and Natasha Zvereva at the Grand Slams tournaments in 1994. By year's end, she was named by TENNIS magazine as rookie of the year.

Along the way to becoming a tennis star, Smashnova learned about being Jewish by staying with families while traveling around the world.

"On a Friday night, I saw a woman making a blessing over candles. I asked 'What is this?' It was my introduction to Judaism," said Smashnova.

From 1996 to 1998, Smashnova's ranking dropped from 42 to 149 when she traded her tennis racquet for a rifle, serving in the Israeli army for two years.

Since returning to the pro circuit full time in 1998, her ranking has been as compelling as her name. She is currently ranked 45th and at age 23 seems to be on the rise despite losing 3-6, 6-2, 6-1 to Russian Elena Likhovtseva in her opening round match at the du Maurier Open.

Toronto fans marvelled at her hustle and backhand. Smashnova's best moments in the match came when she sliced her backhand over the net numerous times, saving three break points on serve and breaking Likhovtseva's serve to win the opening set.

Drop Shots

Former tennis great, Harold Solomon, who was inducted into the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in 1985, is now coaching tennis star Jennifer Capriati. The coach is making strides. Capriati has won two tournaments since working with Solomon in March. Over his career, Solomon won 22 titles, including a 1975 Toronto tournament and a 1980 title in Tel Aviv.

Will Jordan Bohnen become the next great Canadian Jewish tennis player? Bohnen, at 18, is ranked ninth among Canadian juniors. The Toronto native who won a bronze medal in mixed doubles at the 1997 Maccabiah Games, hopes to pursue a tennis scholarship at an American university. With a rise in his rankings, Bohnen may be competing at next year's Canadian Open at York University.

Israelis seek berth in European Cup

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor
With files from Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel moved one step closer to qualifying for soccer's European Cup by easily beating San Marino last week at the national stadium in Ramat Gan.

If Israel qualifies, it will be the first time the national team qualifies for the most prestigious soccer tournament in Europe after the World Cup.

Israel has won its last three home games, scoring 16 goals and conceding r one.

The 6-0 victory over San Marino could hardly have come at a better time for Israeli soccer, just three days after a disappointing loss in Cyprus.

Last Wednesday's victory did little to sweeten the national team's head coach Shlomo Scharf, who is still bitter after losing to Cyprus earlier that week. "I still cannot forgive the players for what they did on Sunday," he said after the match. "Only if they beat Spain next month will I forgive them."

With an 8-0 trouncing of Cyprus last Wednesday, Spain clinched the top spot in Group 6.

The top nine teams from each group automatically qualify for next summer's finals. The runner-up with the best record will go automatically, and the next eight teams will play off for the final four spots.

Even if Israel loses in Spain next month, however, it could still grab second place in the group if Cyprus fails to beat Austria.

Belgium and the Netherlands automatically qualify as tournament hosts.

In his first full game for his country, Yossi Benayoun orchestrated the Israeli performance. The 19-year-old midfielder made a very convincing case for his inclusion in the opening line-up, scoring a hat-trick of well-taken goals.

"it may have been 8-0, but it could just as easily have been 28-0. Yossi Benayoun put in a decent performance, but tonight's game proves nothing."

One social worker's odyssey

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

A year ago, Lillian Freedman found a homeless Jewish woman on the streets of Toronto, and in the process, found herself.

Freedman's discovery (in a bus shelter) of "Rachel" – 50ish, frightened, emaciated – led her into a three-month odyssey that effectively shamed the community into confronting Jewish homelessness, at least for awhile.

A one-time social worker who has had her own personal tzuris, Freedman felt her old instincts kick in. Spurred by Rachel's sad plight, Freedman approached Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), which agreed to pay her a small stipend – $2,500 and a continuous float of $200 – to locate homeless Jews and get them into temporary shelter.

It didn't take long to find five of them, four of whom were found permanent accommodations. Freedman's often vocal and sometimes abrasive efforts led to JF&CS establishing its first-ever task force on homelessness. The agency at first believed there were no more than a dozen Jewish homeless on Toronto's streets, but last December, the task force announced that in the previous six months, it helped 27 Jews who had been living in shelters, cars and with friends, "but had no independent accommodations."

Freedman – soft-spoken yet iron-willed, and wholly dedicated to the notion that if Jews don't watch out for fellow Jews, no one will – butted heads with the underfunded, overburdened and defensive JF&CS. Freedman envisioned a more crisis-oriented, long-term approach, complete with telephone hotlines and teams of volunteers hitting the streets to look for Jewish homeless. JF&CS, while adopting several groundbreaking (for it) recommendations, believed the homeless issue could be folded into existing services.

Freedman did not exactly win popularity contests with the community powers-that-be. She rubbed a lot of people the wrong way, partly because she exposed a failure. Only two rabbis in Toronto came forward to help her with personal expenses.

But the good that came out of this union more than made up for any conflict in personalities. The episode left Freedman sad and frustrated, but motivated.

All this is by way of introducing the fact that having racked up an enviable record in tikkun olam, Freedman, at age 57, is packing up her meagre belongings and making aliyah. She's off to Tel Aviv. To do what? Work with the homeless, of course.

She has already arranged to fundraise and volunteer for the city's Program for Street Dwellers, which caters to the growing number of homeless in Tel Aviv, currently estimated at between 80 and 100 on any given night. Over the last two years, officials with the city's social services department have noted some interesting numbers: Among the homeless, 75 percent came to Israel after 1991; there's been a 40 percent increase in substance abuse among them over the last two years; and 16 percent have been categorized as having a mental illness (with the rest suffering, in varying degrees, from personality disorders).

Freedman can hardly wait, mainly because the approach in Israel is geared toward more long-term solutions than in Toronto, where answers tend to resemble band-aids. While Freedman is a fan of the largely church-run Out of the Cold program, she does not have kind words for the project launched last winter by the Jewish humanitarian group Ve'ahavta, which takes out a van once a week to dole out soup, sandwiches and sleeping bags. "It's voyeurism," she says flatly. "The homeless have become trendy. Put yourself in their place. You get a bowl of soup. So what? You're still out on the street, and the person who gave you the soup goes home to a warm bed. Another sandwich? C'mon. Our community can do better."

In Tel Aviv, "it's like a rodeo. They hang on and on, until the person is okay, and they see things right through until the end. They make sure a person lands on his feet."

Toronto's loss is Tel Aviv's gain.

CHALLAH-CRANBERRY BRUNCH CASSEROLE

1 8 oz pkg cream cheese, softened
3/4 cup white sugar
1/4 cup butter
2 tsp vanilla
1 loaf challah, cut into 1 1/2" thick slices
1 tsp cinnamon
5 eggs
3 cups milk
1 cup cranberries

Cranberry-Maple sauce
1 cup maple syrup
2 cups cranberries

Grease 13"x9" baking dish. Lay bread slices in baking dish. After the first layer has been laid out, sprinkle with cranberries. Continue layering bread and sprinkling cranberries until ingredients have been used up.

Beat cream cheese, sugar, butter, vanilla and cinnamon in large mixing bowl until well-blended. Add eggs, one at a time, mixing well after each addition. Stir in milk.

Pour cream cheese mixture over bread in baking dish. Lift up bread slices and tilt the baking dish to allow cream cheese mixture to flow into all areas and come in contact with all the bread. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate overnight.

Bring maple syrup to a boil in saucepan. Add cranberries. Cook over low heat for 10 minutes. Serve warm over casserole.

Vatican denounces book on Pope Pius XII

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — A new book that claims deep-seated anti-Semitism caused the wartime pope to condone the Holocaust and facilitate Hitler's rise to power has drawn Catholic outrage and bolstered Jewish calls to open Vatican archives to scholars.

The issue has also prompted warnings that the troubled legacy of Pope Pius XII – and plans for his possible beatification – could be manipulated to reverse positive strides in Jewish-Catholic relations.

Excerpts from Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII by British historian John Cornwell appear in the October issue of Vanity Fair magazine. Not only do they describe Pius XII, who was pope from 1939 to 1958, as a knee-jerk anti-Semite, but they assert that he helped Hitler consolidate power through the Vatican's 1933 Concordat with the Third Reich.

Pius XII, according to Cornwell, had "undermined potential Catholic resistance in Germany. He had implicitly denied and

MONTREAL — Louise Arbour knew her three years of investigating atrocities and bringing to justice the perpetrators was having some effect when a journalist related the following story to her.

Louise Arbour

He had interviewed an ethnic Albanian from Kosovo who had been severely victimized by the conflict. Her husband was missing or dead, the bombing was still on; and there was little hope of resolution.

He asked her what she would do if and when she returned home.

"She answered: 'I will kill all the Serbs. If I can't, I want to speak to 'that woman judge.'"

"Five years ago, that alternative was not part of the landscape. There was no alternative to the perpetuation of the cycle of violence," Arbour said in an interview.

CANADA

Christians Urged to Visit

TORONTO — Israel's Ministry of Tourism has launched a $250,000 marketing campaign aimed at encouraging Christians in Canada to visit Israel. Radio and print ads urge Canadians to mark the new millennium in the land where Jesus was born, preached and died.

CJC Accuses Burger King

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is expressing "profound concern" over Burger King's recent revocation of a franchise in the West Bank town of Ma'aleh Adumim, five kilometres east of Jerusalem. The fast food chain closed the outlet after the Arab League threatened a boycott. President Moshe Ronen said CJC is "shocked that Burger King has capitulated to such political pressure. We find the company's actions ill-advised and unacceptable."

ISRAEL

Arab Indicted for Murder

JERUSALEM — An Israeli Arab was indicted last week for the August murder of a Jewish couple hiking in a forest in northern Israel. Police said Abdullah Igbariya, 20, planned to use the couple's car to carry a bomb, but was arrested before he could do so. He was arrested days before three other Israeli Arabs were killed when they carried out car bombings in Haifa and Tiberias.

Gas Field Found

JERUSALEM — A large undersea natural gas field has been discovered off the coast of the Gaza Strip by a marine geologist who was trying to locate an ancient shipwreck. The discovery was announced by the National Geographic Society.

WORLD

Cemetery Vandalized

WARSAW — Vandals broke into Warsaw's only surviving Jewish cemetery over Rosh Hashanah, smashing tombstones, scrawling satanic graffiti and strewing ashes, beer cans and other rubbish. Andrzej Zozula, executive director of the Union of Polish Jewish Communities, said Warsaw police were investigating. Zozula added that the desecration appeared to have been the work of a satanic cult and it that was not clear whether anti-Semitism played a primarily role.

Synagogue Trashed

BUDAPEST — A synagogue in eastern Hungary was burned to the ground by arsonists, according to local police. The synagogue in the town of Tokaj has not been used for religious purposes since before World War II, when there were still thousands of Jews still living there. Just the same, the synagogue had been undergoing renovations during the past four years, with local officials planning to use it for cultural events.

Lawsuits Dismissed

NEW YORK — A lawsuit brought on behalf of Nazi-era slave workers against Ford was dismissed last week by a federal judge in Newark. The judge ruled that the claims were filed after the expiration of time limits imposed under U.S. and German law. The ruling came hours after another judge in Newark threw out a similar class action lawsuit brought against two German firms, electronics giant Siemens and chemicals manufacturer Degussa. Experts said the rulings could bolster the position of German firms in ongoing negotiations for the creation of a fund to compensate former slave laborers.

Bar Mitzvah Plans

LOS ANGELES — Actor Kirk Douglas plans to celebrate his second bar mitzvah when he marks his 83rd birthday in December. According to tradition, a person's allotted life span is 70 years, so the actor feels that in his "second life," his bar mitzvah is due 13 years later. A spokesperson for Douglas said the ceremony will be held in Los Angeles.

Greeks Pay Tribute

ATHENS — Greek officials last week honored the Israeli team, and units from other countries, that helped with the rescue efforts in the wake of the earthquake that shook the city this month. During the ceremony, Greek President Kostis Stefanopoulos addressed the Israeli rescuers, saying, "In spite of your own troubles, you came to our help. We will not forget this. We are your friends." Some Greek Jewish observers said the Israeli team did more to improve often strained Greek-Israeli relations than any government officials could have done.

Netanyahus Questioned, Could Face Charges

JERUSALEM — Police fraud investigators questioned former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife Sara separately for more than eight hours last week on suspicion that they received bribes and misused public funds du ing Netanyahu's three-year term of office.

Netanyahu is also suspected of trying to suborn a witness and disrupt the investigation. His former bureau chief, Uri Elitzur, was also questioned in the affair, and the interrogation of Avner Amedi, the Jerusalem contractor involved in the affair who was remanded into custody last week, continued.

Investigators at the Bat Yam fraud squad headquarters cautioned all those questioned in the affair that they may face charges.

The Netanyahus, who deny the allegations, are likely to be questioned again. Police also plan to question workers in the Netanyahu household, including Sara Netanyahu's former secretaries.

According to police sources, there were "significant" contradictions between the accounts given by Benjamin and Sara Netanyahu, and between their accounts and those given by Amedi and his wife, Aliza.

Free Israel trips offered to young adults

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In February, 1,000 university-aged Jews from across Canada will be taking a free trip to Israel for 10 days of fun and learning.

The free trips are a gift from Birthright Israel, a $300 million international program launched by Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, aimed at preventing assimilation and giving young Jews a strong sense of Jewish identity.

Organizers hope the tours will foster a strong bond among participants.

"This is above all a social experience. What we want them to come away with, as much as the love for Israel and as much as learning about their roots and their heritage – we want them to feel a part of the Jewish community," said Adam Minsky, assistant director of Birthright Israel Canada.

Meals, entrance fees, and the cost of travelling to and from Israel will be subsidized by the program.

Participants must be between 18 and 26 years of age and need only pay for travel insurance and bring spending money, said Minsky.

Twenty-five tours will be leaving departure points across Canada during university and college reading weeks throughout February.

These tours, organized by the Canada Israel Experience Centre in partnership with Jewish Campus Services (JCS), Hillel, the United Jewish Appeal and Combined Jewish Appeal Federations across Canada, are the inaugural program of Birthright Israel Canada.

The program's campus partners are planning optional pre-trip activities aimed at "building a sense of togetherness and community so by the time they get to Israel, there will be that sense of energy," said Zac Kaye, executive director of JCS in Toronto.

While still at the brainstorming stage, JCS's ideas for pre-trip activities include an Israeli film night, a Chanukah party, a mock Knesset session dealing with the peace process and a wine and cheese party.

Campus organizations are also planning post-trip activities to rekindle the excitement of the Israeli tour, Kaye said.

"Hopefully, relationships will have been built so people will want to come together," he said.

Birthright Israel

Although there are 25 trips leaving at different times, they will have similar itineraries and all participants will visit major sights.

"There isn't anybody who's going to come back from this not having been to the Old City of Jerusalem, not having been to Masada, to the Dead Sea, not having been to a variety of sites in the Galilee, not having spent time in Tel Aviv," said Minsky.

These Israel adventures will be a hybrid of education and fun, Minsky added, noting that 25 top Israeli educators and tour guides were chosen to act as consultants.

"We sat down and said we have 10 days in Israel, we have a very strong educational vision for this. If you had to prioritize ... what would you focus on, what sites would you go to?"

Each tour will be going to an ancient Roman hot spring in Hammat Gader southeast of the town of Tiberias, an archaeological dig at Beit Guvrin (a national park) followed by a party in ancient caves. Each tour will also spend a Shabbat in the old city of Jerusalem and visit Tel Aviv clubs at night.

The Canadian tourists will have scheduled interaction with their Israeli peers. Some groups will actually travel with Israelis their age, while others will have programs with young Israelis such as cooking together or spending time with soldiers on an army base.

The staff on the trip will include Israeli educators and tour guides, Canadian Israel tour experts and Jewish outreach workers from campus organizations like Hillel and Jewish Campus Services.

One of the goals of the program is to reach out to young, unaffiliated Jews – those apathetic to Judaism and those who have had little exposure to the religion growing up.

"We want them identifying themselves in a way that they haven't up until that point. Feeling a connection to Israel and to its people that they've never had," said Elizabeth Sokolsky, national director of Birthright Israel Canada.

Sokolsky hopes young people who otherwise might never have gone to a Jewish campus program will return to their university or college feeling "comfortable and connected," she said.

Organizers expect the trips will have a lasting impact.

"I see this as a stepping stone. I don't want these 10 days to be their

A deadly irony

At time of writing, Moscow has been rocked by three terrorist bombings in the past three weeks that have violently taken the lives of almost 200 people and injured countless more.

Earlier this month, in Dagestan, a bomb exploded an apartment complex housing Russian soldiers and their families, killing 64 people and leaving many more wounded. When tallied alongside the 17 or more killed in the bombing last week in Volgadonsk, the total body count has left the Russian people, and particularly Muscovites, angry but also numb with fright.

They have every right to be frightened because most of the bombs now seem to be aimed at them – unarmed individuals who are helpless to defend themselves.

The more victims, and the more helpless the victims – children, seniors and the infirm – the greater the sense of achievement and accomplishment celebrated by the terrorizing, craven murderers who pass themselves off as "guerrillas" or "freedom fighters" or "holy warriors."

These brutal outrages afflict Russia at a time when it is already economically and politically weak. Few people have faith in the institutions of its society, in the effectiveness of its law enforcement agencies or in the trustworthiness of its leaders.

It is a vulnerable place where ruthless people lie in the wings, awaiting their chance to exploit the people's sense of burden and distress. They are quick to point fingers at the "enemies of the state."

To his credit, Russian president Boris Yeltsin tried to rein in the sense of xenophobia spreading quickly and dangerously in many circles of Russian society. In a nationwide television address last week, he said that "terrorism has declared war on the Russian people." He was harsh in his condemnation. "This enemy does not have a conscience, shows no sorrow and is without honor." But he specifically did not single out any group. "It has no face, nationality or belief."

Russian leaders were not as cautious in their responses. Moscow Mayor and presidential aspirant, Yuri Luzkhov identified "Chechen bandits" as the source of the bombings.

A group calling itself the Dagestan Liberation Army has claimed responsibility for the bombings.

Most analysts believe Chechen rebels and their radical Islamic allies from Dagestan to be behind the bombings. Indeed, some Russian officials have even said that Osama bin Laden, the exiled Saudi being sought by the Americans in connection with the bombings of U.S.embassies in Africa last year, has been supporting the Dagestani rebels.

In truth, however, it is not yet certain who is behind the bombings.

Some people even attribute the bombings to rogue security agents or fascist political elements intent on wreaking a measure of political havoc in the run-up to the impending Russian presidential elections.

To help instil a feeling of security among its people, the Kremlin is turning to other countries for assistance. Interior Minister Vladimir Rushailo told the press last week that Moscow had appealed to Britain, France, the United States and Israel (our emphasis) to share their anti-terrorism expertise.

I deplore and condemn and denounce all terrorism. The loss of innocent Russian life is no less grievous than that of any other human life. However, the irony in the Russian appeal to Israel is too significant to ignore.

Israel's expertise in anti-terrorism was in large part acquired by fighting the terrorists whom the Kremlin, for many years, encouraged, financed, trained and supplied; and by fighting the Soviet Union's client states who sheltered and championed those terrorists and who were the Kremlin's automatic anti-Israel allies in the General Assembly.

I quote from an excerpt of an article written by the world-renowned scholar Yonah Alexander entitled "Some Perspectives on Terrorism and the Soviet Union," which appeared in the Terrorism Reader, edited by Alexander and by Walter Laqueur in 1987, Meridian Press.

"But despite all efforts at control, the level of terrorist violence remains high. There are many reasons for this, but there is one universal key factor: the toleration, encouragement, and even support of terrorism by the Soviet Union."

The legacy of the terrorist is slaughter and mayhem. His ways are ways of hatred, violence and cowardice. Eventually, however, the hatred turns on itself, for hatred is all it knows. The chief ambition of the hater is to destroy, not to build.

How wise our sages were when they warned that "he who sows the wind will reap the whirlwind."

Triathlete bows out of competition on holiday

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As an elite triathlete, Shawna Novak is used to seeing things through. After all, it takes rare single-mindedness to swim for 1.5 kilometres, followed immediately by 40 kilometres of biking, and topped off by a 10-kilometre run.

But when the 1999 Triathlon World Championships were held in Montreal on Rosh Hashanah, Novak, among the few Jewish triathletes competing on the world stage, was thrown into uncharacteristic doubt.

It took a few weeks of soul-searching, but Novak, 22, finally decided not to compete.

"I had to really think about what was important to me," the fourth-year chemistry student and athlete told The CJN from her parents' Markham home. "Judaism is a big part of me and my family."

This year's world championships had been scheduled to take place in Germany in early September. But the event was moved to Montreal, and Novak and about a half-dozen North American Jewish triathletes found out in July that one of the two days of races would coincide with the Jewish new year.

Novak had been scheduled to race on Sept. 12, the second day of Rosh Hashanah.

Despite initial doubts that she would attend, she went ahead and qualified for the event, and reserved a spot for herself. It would have been her first world championship.

She spent the next few weeks looking inward. A graduate of Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Novak has also taught Hebrew in Kingston, where she attends Queen's University.

> 'Judaism is a big part of me and my family'

Shortly before the championships, she consulted Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David Synagogue, where Novak's parents have deep roots.

"But by that time, my mind was made up. I wouldn't go."

Novak says she has no regrets about her decision, but "there is a lot of frustration and wistfulness. I know I could have done well.

"But I had to be true to myself."

She points out that the scheduling also presented problems for the Israeli team, which has 30 members. Three Israelis ended up competing in Montreal anyway.

Novak says a petition protesting the scheduling has been started by an American Jewish triathlete, Joanna Zeiger. And, she adds, an apology to Jewish triathletes was posted on the Triathlon Canada Web site.

Novak, who won a bronze medal for Canada in the last Maccabiah Games, plans to turn professional when she's 24.

But before that, she has a big duathlon in October (two events, biking and running). The next world triathlon championship is scheduled to take place in Perth, Australia next April.

Novak half-jokes that she's hopeful it won't take place on Passover.

Women's role in law lauded by chief justice

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The most important development in the legal profession has been the dramatically increased role of women, according to Roy McMurtry, chief justice of Ontario.

When he became a lawyer 40 years ago, "there were only seven women amongst the more than 250 lawyers called to the bar, [but] now in Ontario, at least half of every law school class has been female," he said.

McMurtry's speech was delivered by Susan Himel, a judge on the Superior Court of Justice, at Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's recent fall general meeting and bazaar launch, because McMurtry was unable to attend.

"Women are now amongst our most skilled advocates, and while women are still under-represented on the bench, much progress is being made," McMurtry said.

He and his wife were stereotypical of the '50s, he said. "Ria went into teaching and I went into law. However, our eldest daughter went into law, and is now a criminal court judge in Regina, and our eldest son is a teacher."

The topic, women and the law, said McMurtry, embraces a much wider range of issues than women in the legal profession. "Indeed, this year is the 70th anniversary of the famous Canadian Persons case when the judicial committee of the Privy Council in Britain over-ruled the Supreme Court of Canada, and held that women were legal persons and therefore qualified to sit as senators.

"The Supreme Court of Canada had ruled that because only the masculine pronoun was used legislatively to describe a senator's qualifications, the term 'qualified persons,' therefore, did not include women."

McMurtry was proud, he said, that in 1978, when he was attorney general for Ontario, the first family law reform act was introduced. The law was changed to presume an equal ownership of the matrimonial home and the removal of the concept of fault-finding in relation to support obligations.

In the realm of criminal law, McMurtry said, it has only been in relatively recent years that the legislators and courts have promulgated reforms that have resulted in fairer treatment for female victims of sexual assault.

"So pervasive is violence against women throughout the world, that in 1981, the international community adopted the convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women. Central to that definition of discrimination was that it included violence that is directed against a woman and that affects women disproportionately."

It was within this framework, he said, that Canada developed the sexual assault provisions of the criminal code, particularly with respect to the issue of consent.

With regards to women in the legal profession, he said, since the 1980s, there has been an increase in the number of visible minority women at the bar, "although they were, and continue to be, under-represented relative to their numbers in the general population."

Although still in the minority, he said, women are increasingly occupying leadership roles in the profession. There have been a number of appointments of women to judicial posts, and there are now tenured women professors in Ontario faculties of law.

"Affirmative action programs in legal education and in the professional environment will likely contribute towards correcting imbalances. Issues such as parental leave, sexual harassment, discrimination and flexibility of working conditions have to be addressed."

There have been definite efforts by women, McMurtry said, to challenge the structure and focus of the legal profession. "They have endeavored to influence the way in which law is taught and practised, to challenge traditional assumptions, and to educate the profession and judiciary on gender issues.

"Beyond gender, women are recognizing that they are not a homogeneous group and that issues such as race and sexual orientation, among other differences, have to be addressed."

Sounds of joy at hearing impaired girl's bat mitzvah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rachel Wayne has never let the sounds of silence interfere with her life.

The poised and articulate 12-year-old is hearing impaired. But that didn't prevent her from celebrating her bat mitzvah earlier this month.

The Sept. 4 event, attended by some 150 family and friends, is still all the buzz at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, where Cantor Yehuda Rottner shakes his head in near disbelief at his student's ability.

"She's just unbelievable," enthuses the cantor. "She speaks fluent Hebrew, and she chanted her parshah absolutely accurately."

Rachel depends on lip reading and limited hearing. Both her parents, Martyn and Andrea Wayne, and her little sister Brooke are profoundly deaf.

Her parents are fluent in sign language. "Not me," Rachel confesses. "My bubbie wants me to talk."

And, no doubt, sing. Rachel learned her Maftir and Haftorah from an audio cassette provided by Rottner, who also employed special methods to teach her the many high, low and trilling notes.

He would enunciate the words slowly and carefully, and accompany that with facial expressions and fingers near his mouth pointing up or down.

"And we practised a lot," Rottner adds.

Rachel shrugs. "It wasn't hard," she says.

A Grade 8 student at Associated Hebrew Schools, Rachel is an accomplished baseball and hockey player, a top student, and a regular competitor in Bible contests. Her goal is to one day play Olympic hockey.

The highlight of the ceremony came when Rachel and 8-year-old Brooke led the congregation in Ein Kelokaynu and Adon Olam. "It was remarkable," Rottner recalls. "The place went bananas."

Rachel remembers, "Brooke hogged the microphone."

Martyn and Andrea Wayne, who are active in TJAD, the Toronto Jewish Association of the Deaf, kvelled at their daughter's accomplishment.

In remarks to the assembled guests, Rachel's grandmother, Barbara Lieberman, praised the bat mitzvah girl's "undaunted spirit and remarkable sense of determination that have helped you face all your challenges and brought us here, now, to this monumental event."

Rottner now has his eye on Brooke. "I can't wait to teach her," he says.

Disney, but no fantasy

Flush from their successful bullying of Burger King to withdraw a franchise licence from one of their fast food outlets in Ma'aleh Adumim, The Arab League has now set its sights on a new target: Disney World in Orlando, Fla.

Along with various Arab American groups, the Arab League has put Disney on notice that they, effectively, want a say in how Disney refers to and depicts Jerusalem in a new 24-pavilion, multi-media display called the Millennium Village scheduled to open at The Epcot Centre on Oct. 1. Israel is one of the 24 countries sponsoring a pavilion in the Millennium Village. Indeed, Israel's foreign ministry has contributed $1.8 million (US) of the $8 million cost of the pavilion.

Disney officials have said that the Israel pavilion will trace the country's religious history and showcase Israeli technological advances. The core of the exhibit is "Journey through Jerusalem," a simulated tour tracing the city's history.

Though no details of the Israel pavilion have been revealed to the public, Arab American officials have, nevertheless, launched their protest. "Disney World is making a political statement about an issue that has not been settled yet," said Khalid Turaani, the executive director of the Washington-based organization American Muslims for Jerusalem.

Our main objective is "to be sure that Walt Disney is not bringing politics into its commercial activity in a way that will hurt the Arab and Islamic rights to Jerusalem," said Khalid Abdallah, the Arab League's chief representative in Washington.

"We will continue to press to ensure that Arab east Jerusalem is not portrayed in Disney's exhibit as part of Israel," said PA member Hanan Ashrawi.

American Jewish groups are carefully monitoring the situation. But it is a situation that, in various forms and shapes, and with infuriating regularity, will arise throughout the period of final-status talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

It is the next phase of the battle for Jerusalem. In this battle, we, the entire Jewish people are all soldiers. The "arms" we take up are those of passion, truth and justice. They are weapons whose "purity" inspires us to wield them with conviction.

Back at the UN

The 54th session of the General Assembly convened this year on Yom Kippur. Despite the efforts of the government of Israel and many Jewish organizations in the United States to have the opening postponed, the General Assembly's current president, Didier Opertti of Uruguay refused. The UN is closed on major Christian and Muslim holidays. Even though Secretary General Kofi Annan appears to have been embarrassed by the Assembly's brutish insensitivity to the Jewish people, let us hope that this is not an augury for the proceedings that unfold over the course of the next few months. Somehow, every year, we expect less and less from that august body of united nations.

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

Says CJN should not adopt American spelling

I have noticed again and again that The Canadian Jewish News should really be called the American Jewish News. I would strongly encourage the editorial staff to review the inappropriate American English spelling found throughout the paper (eg. honor, color, neighbor, program), etc.

Students in the Canadian public school system are penalized for using American spelling and learn the British English language from day one! As The CJN is a Canadian national publication, editors and writers should be much more careful especially when this sort of thing even pops out at the reader in headlines (eg. page 19 of the Sept. 2 issue).

I would suggest that the word processing software in your offices be reset accordingly.

Thank you for looking into this. I look forward to seeing this corrected in upcoming issues.

New Judaic museum in Paris a must

Having visited France and Israel this summer, I offer two short comments about recent stories. First, your correspondents Curt and Erika Leviant in their article on Paris (Aug. 26) noted "the new Picasso Museum," which is actually some 10 years old, in the historical Marais district, but completely omitted any mention of the really new (opened December 1998) and spectacular Museum of the Art and History of Judaism also located in the Marais. This stunning museum, housed in a restored 17th-century palace, truly is a must for all Jewish visitors to Paris.

Second, the story about the terrible toll of road accidents in Israel, by Viva Press (Aug. 26) was excellent. My wife and I drove over 3,100 kilometres in our rental car, all over the country. We were last there in 1990. The quality of the roads has greatly improved, and most drivers are driving only a little over the limit and with better care. The police are out in force to catch speeders and those behaving crazily – I never see as many cruisers on the 401 as I did on the Ayalon and other Israeli expressways.

Millennium applies only to Christian calendar

For quite some time I have been wondering about the hype in some Jewish circles about the new millennium. Now we hear even from an Israel official that we should visit Israel "the official destination of the millennium." (CJN, Aug. 19)

I could give 1,000 reasons why we should visit Israel any year, but none for the year 2000. That time frame is a Christian calendar and it is appropriate for Christians to celebrate it in the Holy Land where their lord was born.

If we are looking for a reason to celebrate the coming year here or in Israel, may I humbly suggest 5760, which has a numerical value of 18 – chai. Am Yisrael chai b'shalom.

Shanah tovah to all.

Suggests another meaning for beit chaim

In From the editor's desk (CJN, Sept. 9) MBD is trying to translate cemeteries' names. I would like to suggest another version for beit chaim.

I remember reading in a paragraph of Hok Leisrael a commentary on the following verse: "And Benayahu Ben Yehoyada was the son of a man alive (chai)." It is followed by the logical question: "Are all the other people in the world sons of dead men?" The commentator explains that "chai" in this case doesn't mean alive but "just," and what the verse wanted to say is that Benayahu was the son of a "tzaddik" (a "just" person).

I propose to translate beit chaim by the place (or the house) of the just, because our sages say that "the tzaddikim are also called alive and considered more alive."

Reader liked the article on Eliezer Steinbarg

It was very refreshing to read the essay about the famous Yiddish fabulist Eliezer Steinbarg. (CJN, June 10). It was a beautiful analysis by Baruch Cohen. Thank you, Baruch Cohen.

The Dreyfus trial: its place in Jewish history

The following is part 1 of a two-part essay, to be continued next week.

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

Of the many public trials that must have taken place in the course of the millennium, which now is about to end, there is one which stands out above all — the Dreyfus trial. It wielded enormous impact on both the history of France and on the future of the Jewish people, and it constitutes the crucial link in the chain of events which ultimately brought the State of Israel into being.

Alfred Dreyfus and Theodor Herzl were two very assimilated Jews, who in the first 35 years of their respective lives never saw themselves as playing any major role in Jewish life, nor even a minor role. They were born seven months apart — Dreyfus in France and Herzl in Austria-Hungary — but other than being of the same age, they had no connection with each other and no knowledge of each other. And there was nothing visibly Jewish about either of them.

Then in 1894 their paths crossed at the trial of Dreyfus, and suddenly their names became dramatically emblazoned in the annals of history.

Alfred Dreyfus was born in Mulhouse, Alsace in 1859, to a Jewish-French family of successful bankers. After Prussia's victory over France in 1871, Alsace became part of Germany. The Dreyfus family staunchly identified with France, so they left their home town and moved to Paris. Young Alfred entered military school, and, as a result of his natural talent and intense diligence, he rose to membership of the general staff and to the rank of captain.

French Anti-Semitism

Anti-Semitism was more intense in France at the time than in any other democratic country. This had been the case ever since the French Revolution: indeed, a delegate in the National Assembly, referring specifically to French Jewry, spoke in 1790 of "this influx of Africans which has infested our homeland of France."

However, the French Constitution protected all citizens, and thus there were no formal barriers to Jewish social and economic advancement. On the face of it, such absence of impediments would have been highly desirable. But it also generated adverse fallout. There was resentment against the large number of Jews holding high positions in industry, government, and military service, and this resentment served to stoke the fires of anti-Semitism.

In 1871, France suffered a humiliating defeat by the army of Prussia. National adversity, whether military or economic, tends to encourage the growth of anti-Semitism, and this was indeed very much the case in France after the Franco-Prussian War – especially so in the 1890s, which was a period of severe economic depression.

Newspapers with anti-Semitic leanings became more brazen, and their circulation increased. New anti-Jewish journals appeared on the scene, some with the sole purpose of denigrating Jews.

In 1889, the French National Anti-Semitic League was established, and two years later, a motion by 32 deputies of the National Assembly demanded the expulsion of all Jews from France. Nowhere in the world had any country, even the most oppressive, resorted to nationwide expulsion of Jews at any time in that century — so this proposal was indeed most extreme.

In 1892, a newspaper financed by the Jesuits launched a virulent campaign against Jewish army officers, accusing them of selling French military secrets for personal profit.

Treason in the Army

It was against this hostile background that in August 1894 the French Intelligence discovered a sheet of paper which was to become world-famous. They called it the bordereau, meaning document. It was addressed to an attache at the German Embassy in Paris, and apparently had somehow been extracted by a French agent from the embassy's incoming mail.

The bordereau conveyed French military data to Germany, now the arch-enemy of France. The contents indicated that the writer was a staff-officer, otherwise he would not have had access to the classified information it contained. The conclusion was inescapable that within the upper circle of the French military there was a traitor, and it was imperative that he be apprehended immediately.

Investigators went through the names of French staff officers, and inevitably they were drawn to Dreyfus, the Jew. Background checks indicated that his character was impeccable, his military record exemplary, and his financial situation so comfortable that he had no pressing need for additional funds. The one finding which might be used against him was his handwriting: it could be construed, if so desired, to bear some resemblance to the script on the bordereau.

Dreyfus Arrested

But Dreyfus was a Jew, and in the pervading bias of the day that one factor outweighed all others. Indeed, the bordereau included some data which Dreyfus would almost certainly not have known, and also some factual errors that would have been highly uncharacteristic of him. These details were summarily dismissed and Dreyfus was pronounced to be the traitor. He was secretly arraigned and held in custody, but not given any explanation. The arrest struck him like a bolt of lightning out of a blue sky. His wife was warned not to tell anyone, not even the immediate family.

Nothing could be publicized, however, nor any further action taken, without the approval of the secretary of war, Gen. Mercier, and the materials were laid before him. What he saw left him with grave doubts. He sought hard evidence of Dreyfus' guilt, and he found none. So he consulted with colleagues and experts.

But at this juncture, the story leaked out to the press. Bold headlines appeared, such as, "Jewish officer Dreyfus arrested." The press spoke of "absolute proof," and cited the prisoner's "full confession." Falsehoods such as these immediately roused nationwide fury, and in the court of public opinion the verdict was reached on the first day — a resounding guilty.

Dreyfus on Trial

That placed the war minister in a dilemma. He had been inclined to drop the case for lack of evidence, but were he to do this now in the face of an enraged electorate, he would be vilified as a Jew-lover, protecting a traitor. He would have to resign in disgrace.

If, on the other hand, the case proceeded and the judges found the evidence inadequate, that too would be a humiliating setback. He opted to proceed with the trial, and in order to effect a politically desirable verdict, he devised a plan to ensure that the outcome would be conviction.

He ordered that all available evidence from other spy cases which could in any way be construed to refer to Dreyfus should be gathered, retouched as necessary, and then conveyed to Dreyfus' judges, without being revealed to the defence lawyers. Had these lawyers been aware of this material, they would undoubtedly have demonstrated its irrelevance. Included in this secret dossier were some incriminating letters purported to have been written by Dreyfus and some by German officials, but in fact all were forged.

This entire secret procedure was contrary to French legal practice, but not one of the seven judges objected. All these materials were destroyed as soon as the judges had seen them, so that they could never be subsequently examined or challenged.

The court itself was a military tribunal, and thus its deliberations and its decisions were identified with "the honor of the French army." This identification with military honor was to render it extremely difficult to pose any future appeals or challenges. In the scale of values of that era, challenging the honor of the French army was almost akin to treason.

Court sessions commenced on Dec. 19, 1894 and lasted four days — all in closed chambers. Dreyfus, of course, knew that he was innocent, and his faith in French military justice was, as yet, unshakable. He was thus confident of exoneration. But the verdict went the opposite way: guilty of treason, by unanimous vote. The penalty was to be public degradation, then exile for life to Devil's Island.

Upon hearing the verdict, Dreyfus became visibly disoriented. But the governor of the prison where he was incarcerated was fully convinced of his innocence and helped him regain his composure. An appeal was quickly filed but was rejected after only the briefest of hearings.

After the Trial

The degradation ceremony was set for Jan. 5, 1895, and to this the public was invited. Dreyfus' military stripes were torn off, his sword broken, and he was marched around the square. The shrieking crowd jeered him and shouted insults, such as, "see the new Judas," "bring back the death penalty," "you filthy traitor," "death to the Jews."

It was a sickening scene, reminiscent of public floggings in the Middle Ages. The unfortunate Dreyfus maintained his military composure throughout, repeatedly declaring his innocence and his loyalty to France.

Journalists were assigned a designated place in the square. Among them was the correspondent of a German-language newspaper in Austria. His name, Theodor Herzl. This was the fourth year of his assignment in Paris, and it was now his task to report on the ugly scene unfolding around him. He listened in horror as the journalists at his side, some of them his personal, professional friends, joined enthusiastically in the catcalls of the bloodthirsty mob.

This scene, the trial which preceded it, and the nationwide anti-Jewish demonstrations which were to follow, entirely changed Herzl's outlook on Western civilization, and, more importantly, on the future of the Jewish people. France, a bastion of democracy and advanced culture, was the land of liberty, equality, and fraternity. He was astounded at how readily such a country resorted to perversions of justice and to unbridled anti-Semitism. The values he had espoused a few weeks earlier were now shattered.

For the first time in his life he determined to be, above all, an advocate for the Jewish people, and for the first time, his goal was Jewish statehood. In 1896, the year after this degradation ceremony, Herzl wrote his monumental work, The Jewish State: An Attempt to Solve the Jewish Question. Thus was set in motion the chain of events leading to the State of Israel.

Opinions

Albania's Jews

In a recent article, I set forth briefly how well the Jews were treated in Albania during the days of the Nazi terror. My sources were sparse, but I came across a more specific letter that Rabbi Bernard H. Rosenberg of Edison, N.J., published in the National Jewish Post & Opinion (a weekly published in Indianapolis).

Rabbi Gunther Plant in Toronto

With the permission of the author, I would like to acquaint you with his argument: "Albania was an asylum for Jews escaping the Nazis, even before World War II started. Thousands were able to obtain visas to pass through or stay in Albania. Jews have lived in Albania since the start of the Common Era.

"When the Nazis asked for a list of Jews in 1943, the Albanian government refused, and Jews went into hiding. Albanian Jews and others ... were hidden by both Muslims and Christians. In keeping with the character of their country, in which anti-Semitism was never a problem, Albanian underground fighters issued an order in 1943 that anyone refusing to give sanctuary to those in need would be subject to execution 'for the crime of disgracing the Albanian people.'

"Albanians never turned over lists of Jews to the Germans, nor were Jews ever mandated to wear the yellow star. Even the Italian occupying forces in Albania went along with the Albanian policy toward the Jews. All Jews in Albania escaped the Holocaust.

"Abraham H. Foxman, national director, Anti-Defamation League, remarks that 'the Albanian people, the majority of whom were Muslim, protected and saved the entire Jewish population.'

"Until recently, Albania followed an isolationist policy; and no one outside the country reported the heroic deeds. Albania's achievement in saving all its Jews is even more impressive when compared to the fate of Jews in Greece, its neighboring country. More than 90 percent of the Jewish community there perished.

"As a child of survivors of the Holocaust, and as one who was born in a displaced persons camp in Germany, I plead that we help our Albanian brethren. We must save their lives. I lost most of my family in the Holocaust. We dare not allow history to repeat itself. We must be able to tell our children and grandchildren that we stood up and spoke out. Never again can we allow brutality to reign supreme."

So far Rabbi Rosenberg's letter. He reminds us of a time when Albania was indeed a hermetically sealed Communist nation of which we knew very little. Circumstances have made it now the centre of our attention. At last we are able to draw the curtain of history aside and see who our friends were during World War II.

The one place that is rarely mentioned in dispatches is Montenegro. It has no large cities, but boasts beautiful mountain slopes and a lovely beach along the Adriatic Sea. In Nazi days this small part of the Yugoslav Republic harbored a Jewish community that was fortunate in being occupied not by Nazi troopers but by Italian forces who were unenthusiastic about Nazi plans for the Jews. Today Montenegro can boast the highest per capita acceptance of refugees in Kosovo. It is a fact worth remembering.

Sukkot and back-to-school

Is it coincidental that Sukkot, a holiday signifying movement, comes at the same time of year as the new school year? Or since Sukkot came first, is it coincidental the new school year is so close to Sukkot?

Jennifer Fax on campus in Halifax

It has always made sense to me that the Jewish new year coincides with the start of the school year. They are both times to hope for something better and to forgive the mistakes of the past. How often have I sworn to myself, each September, that this would be the year I gained some appropriate study habits and prayed my teachers would forgive any past transgressions.

Rosh Hashanah, which is millennium compatible for another 240 years, is not the only holiday symbolizing the life of the September student. Sukkot also fits in well with the back-to-school theme.

When I returned to Halifax this year, I moved into an apartment complex instead of the house I shared the previous year. This change in location introduced me to a new form of chaos.

I watched as truck after truck pulled into the small parking circle and off of each vehicle came a bed, some form of beat-up furniture ranging from kitchen tables to ratty sofas, and students preparing themselves for the year ahead.

The sight conjured up images of an ant colony as scurrying students tried to lug objects which seemed too large for them to possibly bear, marching (or rather grunting) two-by-two through the door and into their new homes.

Though the unloading of household items is reminiscent of a bug's life, it is also a reminder of Sukkot.

Students who don't live at home during their higher-education years tend not to return to the same place each year. Their households are not permanent, but boxed up each May and unpacked each September at a new address.

Much like the makeshift homes the sukkah provided our ancestors, so too does the university student know that their four walls and roof are only temporary. Each year they must, figuratively, rebuild their bed, bath and kitchen supplies and arrange their belongings. Similarly, although we take the same old pieces of lumber out of the garage to build a sukkah, we must still construct and nail down our ceremonial homes again each year.

There are other similarities between the sukkah and the student apartment. My family would build a small sukkah in our backyard, using the side of our house and fence as two of the four walls.

There was only enough room for the five of us to stand over a little table to recite the blessings. The same could be said of my room last year in Halifax. Big enough for standing around a desk, a few people at a time, and not much else.

Sukkot was also a time for harvest. A time for gathering and storing for the upcoming year. School is both a place for gathering and storing. The gathering of minds and the storing of necessary lessons – not all of which are academic. And though we students whine and complain, as those travelling towards Jerusalem might have done, the end is worth any test we might endure.

Outside my window, the ants continue to scurry into their new colony, challenged with the task of building a liveable anthill with thrift-store finds and nifty products from the local hardware store.

Their homes are only temporary. The hill will eventually be kicked over and a new one constructed with cooler furniture and more kitchen supplies.

We bless our homes with a housewarming party and, like our sukkah, hope it stands for the required time.

The significance of names

Oh the joys of university! Long lines at the bookstore, book buy-backs where they don't actually buy back any of the books you have to sell, classrooms with too few seats, oodles of pages to read in books that are not yet available – a real headache and a test of my nervous system.

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

Despite the list of logistics still to be ironed out, I can report, after five days of school that my classes are intriguing and thought-provoking.

Picture this. There I was in my Hebrew language and literature course, sitting in a classroom at one of those desks with the chairs attached to them, reading an article about people's proper names. My teacher asked us to think about whether our names have given us trouble either here or abroad and whether they have some significance.

My first brainstorm was Lou Bega's song Mambo #5 where he sings about having "Erica by [his] side." My second thought was that whenever a stationery store is selling personalized items such as mugs, pens or paper, the name Erica does not usually exist, or if it does then it is spelt with a "k."

Putting my bitter thoughts aside, I decided to finish reading the article. The piece proposed that a person's first name often teaches others about a person's parents. For example, in the '50s, in Israel, patriotic and zionistic names were extremely popular, such as Tzion, Herzl, Geulah, Aliyah. In the '70s, the names chosen by Israeli parents were more easily adapted to the Diaspora culture; the names included were Sharon, Keren and Michal. I thought of my Israeli cousins and friends, and realized that for the most part the proposed theory is true. My friend Tamar's (Tamar meaning date) parents love nature, and Ilan's (Ilan meaning tree) mother is a botanist; both of them come from Israel.

I then skimmed a mental list of my Canadian friends' names in search of a potentially similar pattern. However, all I could conjure was that parents having children born in 1977-78 loved the letter J. When I got home, I opened my high school yearbook and observed the following results: Of the 128 graduates my year, there were six Jons, three Jasons, three Jeremys, two Jessicas, two Jennifers, one Jackie, one Jack, one Jeff, one Jean, one Jami, one Julia and one Julie. There were 16 individuals whose first names began with the letter A, 14 with the letter D and 13 with the letter M. Ilana (spelled a variety of ways) and Michael were also popular in my grade.

I decided that a more practical way to figure out whether or not my friends' first names were representative of their parents in any way was to ask them. So I picked up the phone and called one of my friends who has three siblings. He told me that none of them have first names that mean anything, his parents simply liked the names, but that all their middle names were names given in honor of late family. The same conclusion was drawn from each of my five subsequent phone calls. In my family, my middle name is after my bubbie's late mother and my youngest brother's middle name is after my late zayde, while our first names were those admired by my parents.

The trend seems to be towards naming your children a name you like as their first name and a more significant name tied to family history for their middle name. In my opinion, this pattern reflects sensitivity towards our changing environment, which fosters individuality and a respect for where and from whom we came.

My brother is still thanking my parents for shying away from their strongly felt desire to name him either Shoe or Fog!

Based on what I learned in my Hebrew language and literature course, I am more inquisitive and sympathetic to others when they introduce themselves to me for the first time. The next time I stand in line for books, I now have a topic for small-talk conversation – or simply something to think about.

The Kirshner File

The Jews of Iran - a tolerated minority

At best, the Jews in the Islamic Republic of Iran are a tolerated minority, susceptible to the vicissitudes of government policy. The recent arrest of 13 Iranian Jews, charged with spying for Israel, may be the result of a power struggle between moderate and conservative forces in Iran. But more to the point, it is symptomatic of the vulnerable status of Jews in this authoritarian, fundamentalist Muslim state.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

One of the charges laid against the accused is that they conducted Hebrew lessons. To the anti-Zionist regime in Teheran, Hebrew is a subversive language inextricably associated with Israel, often described in satanic terms. By this twisted logic, Hebrew is synonymous with espionage. Lest we forget, the former Soviet Union banned the teaching of Hebrew, too. Some of the Refuseniks, including Natan Sharansky, were Hebrew teachers.

With the collapse of the pro-Western monarchy in 1979, Iran's first post-revolutionary leader, the Ayatollah Khomeini, issued a fatwa concerning Jews. As the people of the book, they were to be protected and permitted freedom of religion, alongside Christians.

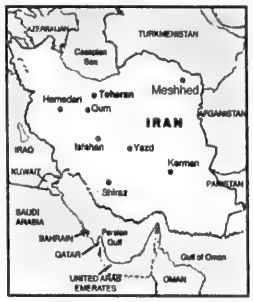
In line with Khomeini's decree, Jews have a right to practise Judaism. There are 11 functioning synagogues in Teheran, where the vast majority of Jews live, as well as a Jewish hospital, a library containing an estimated 20,000 books, two kosher restaurants, an old-age home and a cemetery.

There are no Jewish schools per se, since all schools are under the jurisdiction of the state. But Jewish religious studies are included in the curriculum.

There is a Jewish representative in parliament, yet Jews are powerless politically. Jews were vested with equal rights under the 1906 constitution, but as a tolerated minority they walk on eggshells, never sure when an edict or a development will change their lives irretrievably.

With 25,000 to 35,000 Jews, Iran today is still home to the largest Jewish community in the Muslim world, one whose roots are ancient.

Before Israel's establishment, when approximately half a million Jews could be found in Arab countries, more than 100,000 Jews lived in Iran. Tens of thousands made aliyah, leaving about 60,000 by the mid-1960s.



Under the Pahlavi monarchy, Jews fared reasonably well, certainly far better than Jews in, say, neighboring Iraq or Syria. And because Iran had diplomatic relations with Israel, Iranian Jews were free to travel back and forth. In retrospect, the Pahlavi era was a golden period in the history of Iranian Jewry.

The new Islamic government immediately severed ties with Jerusalem and forbade Jews to visit Israel on pain of imprisonment. As a totalitarian atmosphere descended on Iran, Jews left in droves, mainly for Israel and the United States, particularly the Westwood area of Los Angeles. By all accounts, upwards of 1,000 Jews manage to emigrate every year. Jews who try to leave illegally face real dangers. Since 1994, 11 Jews who have attempted to flee have vanished into thin air.

The crypto-Jewish community of Meshhed

One hundred and sixty years ago, a furious mob rampaged through Meshhed's Jewish quarter, murdering 39 Jews and forcing the conversion of 400 Jewish families in this northeastern Iranian city.

Like the Marranos of Spain, the newly converted Jews, or Jadid al-Islam, lived double lives, practising Judaism in the secrecy of their homes, but following Islamic religious laws and customs in public.

Their tortuous saga is told by the late anthropologist Raphael Patai in his final book, Jadid al-Islam (Wayne State University Press).

To this day, the causes of the 1839 pogrom, known as the Allahdad, are shrouded in mystery. One theory has it that local Muslims vented their fury against Jews after a Jew supposedly killed a dog – a symbol of uncleanliness in Muslim lore – on an Islamic holiday. According to another version, Muslim criminals apparently murdered a Muslim child, left the corpse in a synagogue courtyard, then accused Jews of having perpetrated the misdeed.

These events, whether apocryphal or not, strongly suggest that Jews in 19th century Iran (Persia) were vulnerable targets. As Patai points out, the Shi'ite Muslims of Iran, who formed the vast majority of the population, were more intolerant of different faiths than Sunni Muslims. "In this respect," Patai writes, "the Shi'ite Muslim attitude resembled that of medieval Christianity toward the Jews."

In the wake of their conversion, following the Allahdad, the Jadid al-Islam maintained the appearance of being Muslims during family festivities and observances. Yet, clandestinely, they adhered to Judaism. In their efforts to be true to Judaism, the Jadid al-Islam maintained secret synagogues and schools. They married each other, and through the subterfuge of arranged marriages, ensured that their children would not be betrothed to Muslims.

As the 20th century dawned, the Jadid al-Islam gradually jettisoned the pretense that they were Muslims. Under the strictures of Islam, a Muslim who abandoned the faith could be executed. It didn't matter whether she or he was of new or old Muslim stock.

For a number of reasons, the provision was rarely enforced. The Jadid al-Islam bought the authorities' goodwill with lavish gifts. More importantly, there was never an organized inquisitional body in Iran whose task was to track down, expose and punish individuals who strayed from the path of Islam. Once a Jew accepted Islam, he or she was considered a Muslim. Unlike in Spain, no attempt was made to check the Islamic bona fides of the Jadid al-Islam.

Further, the structure of Persian society was such that ethnic groups were encouraged to maintain their separate identities. And so it was not deemed strange that the Jadid al-Islam were clannish.

Radical Muslim clergymen who resented their "apostasy" incited mobs against them in 1892 and again in 1902. Patai says that these outbreaks were officially frowned upon and stopped. Occasionally, the inciters were subjected to severe penalties.

The Jadid al-Islam began immigrating to Palestine in 1903. A few of the crypto-Jews were prosperous merchants like the Azizullayoffs, the Aminhoffs and the Nasruallyoffs. The spiritual leader of the Jadid al-Islam, Mullah Murad (Mordecai) Aqlar, the author of several religious texts in Judeo-Persian, also made aliyah.

After the 1979 Islamic revolution, the majority of the Meshhed Jews still left in Iran immigrated to Israel and other countries. By 1995, no more than a dozen Jewish families remained in Meshhed.

No matter where they may reside, they continue to preserve their traditions, proud to be the descendants of the Jadid al-Islam, a chapter in Jewish history which Patai illuminates with scrupulous care.

A 1,000-year-old conflict

A Journey To The End Of The Millennium*, by A.B. Yehoshua (Doubleday, $34.95).

Books
Bernard Baskin

The time is the last few months of the year 999. Across Europe there is mingled excitement and fear, mounting at times to religious frenzy in anticipation of the Second Coming.

Ben Attar, a Moroccan Jew, prosperous trader and merchant, shares a three-way partnership with his nephew, Abulafia, and a Muslim, Abu Lufti. The company trades in exotic goods – spices, bolts of embroidered cloth and jewelled daggers procured in Africa and sold in northern Europe.

One day, Ben Attar learns that his nephew wants to terminate his involvement in the business. His reason appears strange and unreasonable. His newly married wife, Esther-Minna, pious and Ashkenazi, objects to Ben Attar's marriage to two women. Polygamy had recently been outlawed among the Ashkenazim, but was still practised by Jews in the Arab world.

The revulsion of Abulafia's wife to Sephardi custom represented the cultural gulf between Jews of Arab-Islamic culture and those of the Christian-European world. The author suggests, however indirectly, that this 1,000-year-old conflict is still – in its fullest sense – the basis for antagonisms between eastern and western Jews in modern Israel.

Ben Attar, eager to preserve the partnership and also convince Esther-Minna that a polygamous family can exist in love and harmony, sets forth by sail from North Africa to Paris. He is accompanied by an ill-assorted group: a rabbi from Toledo and his son, his Arab partner, an Arab crew, a timorous black slave boy and his two wives.

"Not once but many times in the course of the voyage Ben Attar had asked himself... which of Satan's brood had tempted him into abandoning his home and his children and endangering both his two beloved wives and his merchandise on such a ghastly escapade ... And each time he had reminded himself once again that in truth it was not Abulafia's heart that he was trying to win back by means of this crazy journey, but that of his new wife, who, though he had never beheld her face nor heard her voice, was extremely important to him..."

With remarkable fidelity to historical and sociological detail, Yehoshua brings to life the many places the travellers visit – from the tiny port of Rouen, "the cathedral crumpled and sad in its dark severity with its sweet-sour smell blended of incense and sweat, to the fantastic island city of Paris which resembles a gigantic illuminated ship sailing along beside them."

Ben Attar pleads his case in two makeshift courtrooms in isolated Jewish communities of the French countryside. In the first public trial he prevails. But Esther-Minna refuses to accept the verdict and vows that she will divorce her husband. The rabbi from Toledo rashly proclaims his willingness to debate the question again before a second court. This time there is a different verdict with unexpected and unhappy results for all involved in the fierce religious and emotional struggle.

The author, with great skill, relates this complex, densely layered story of love, sexuality, betrayal – against an agitated background of the twilight days when faiths are sharpened at the hinge between one millennium and the next.

In allusive, languorous prose, the author presents both sides of the conflict with sensitivity and understanding. He explores the characters' minds and yearnings, describing the inner and outer journeys in extraordinary details. This is a novel of great power and beauty, perhaps the best of the author's work to date.

Yehoshua, born in 1936, lives in Haifa where he is a professor of literature at Haifa University. One of Israel's most internationally acclaimed writers, he has published 17 books in Hebrew and is a recipient of the coveted Israel Prize.

The etrog and lulav

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"You shall take for yourself the fruit of the beautiful (etrog) tree, a palm frond, myrtle twigs and willow branches of the stream (lulav) – and rejoice for seven days before the Lord your God." (Leviticus 23:40) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/leviticu/torah/23392340.htm]

They are simply three branches and an odd-looking fruit. But when these four species are bound together, something special happens: an annual ritual can be celebrated. Today, the etrog and lulav on the World Wide Web.

There are many interpretations about the significance of the components of the lulav and etrog and similarities drawn between the four species and those of the Jewish people [http://www.aish.edu/calendar/sukkot/unity.htm].

The four species all have different qualities: A lulav (date palm) is edible but has no smell while the myrtle has a good fragrance but is inedible. But unless they are bound together, the lulav is not kosher. Similarly it is suggested that the Jewish people must be unified in order to be truly effective.

For more on the deeper meaning of lulav and etrog, see Nishmas [http://www.nishmas.org.il/chasidus/holidays/sukkos58.htm]. Celebrate with JOI [http://www.joi.org/celebrate/sukkot/4-main.htm], and Ohr Somayach [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/sukkos/species.htm].

A superb lulav and etrog set can cost well over $100. So what should you look for when you're buying? [http://www.aish.edu/calendar/sukkot/4species.htm] An etrog should be turning yellow rather than green. There should be no little dots on its upper part and it should preferably be turning yellow rather than red.

Which hand do you use to pick up the lulav? Should the etrog point up or down? In what order should the lulav be shaken? Those questions are answered in a very step-by-step guide created by the Huntington Jewish Center on Long Island [http://www.uscj.org/metny/huntinhh/shake.html].

The lulav is shaken in all the four directions of the compass plus up and down to acknowledge God's all encompassing presence. But the movements of the lulav can also be given a mystical interpretation [http://www.mishpacha.org/sukkotlulav.shtml]. For example, facing right signifies the attribute of chesed or kindness. "Do you find it too hard to be generous? Pray for God to grant you the proper measure of chesed."

Most of us think about etrogs once a year and really have no idea about the rich history of the citron (citrus medica) [http://www.hort.purdue.edu/newcrop/morton/citron.html]. Did you know that etrog seeds have been found in Mesopotamian excavations dating back 6,000 years? The armies of Alexander the Great are thought to have carried etrogs to the Mediterranean region about 300 B.C.E. In India, the peel is eaten to overcome bad breath. And in Panama, citron leaves are ground up and combined with other ingredients and given as an antidote for poison.

All too soon, Sukkot is over and you are faced with a problem: what to do with the lulav and etrog [http://www.torah.org/linkedlists/torah-forum/vol3/0012.html]. Many people refrain from simply throwing a lulav in the garbage and will bring their lulavs to synagogue and place them on top of the Aron Kodesh. Others will save them until Passover and burn them with the chametz.

As for the etrog, don't throw it away. Eat it! You can find a couple of recipes for etrog jam at [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/etrogjam.htm] and [http://www.shamash.org/listarchives/mailjewish/volume4/v4n89]. But if you want to treasure your etrog year-round, stick some cloves into it and use it as the spice during your weekly havdalah ceremony.

Have a Chag Samayach.

Education versus politics

By AVI BENLOLO

A battle over control of the education system is brewing as Israeli children return to school for a new year, a battle which threatens to further polarize the country's population while creating an atmosphere of uncertainty about the future of schools run by the Shas political party.

The new minister of education, Yossi Sarid of the Meretz party, is withholding funding to Shas schools unless they meet his ministry's criteria. As a result, Shas is now NIS 100 million in debt. The party is scrambling to keep its teachers working and its schools running as it figures out how to maintain funding.

Shas is the official Sephardi party representing some half a million Israelis. Its official mandate is to enhance the political, economic and religious status of Sephardim in Israel. To achieve these objectives, the party founded numerous schools, as well as other social programs, through a grassroots organization called El Hama'ayan.

Despite the fact that the party became the country's third largest in the last elections, Prime Minister Ehud Barak chose to give the Education Ministry previously controlled by Shas to another party (Meretz). No longer in direct control of the portfolio and left to the mercy of Sarid (a serious opponent), Shas is now threatening to leave the coalition unless funding resumes.

Shas has further been weakened as a result of former party leader Aryeh Deri's recent conviction for taking bribes while serving as an Israeli government minister. Unfortunately, Deri's actions created skepticism about the party's management style within the government's top echelons.

The question as to whether there should be a Sephardi school system at all is one which requires careful consideration (although Barak maintains he wants to keep Shas schools). Some theorists argue that by reinforcing ethnic identities, educators are inhibiting the movement toward social unity, that they are contributing to social fragmentation and the Balkanization of a nation. This perspective suggests that one curriculum can equal one people.

But what if the Education Ministry's curriculum does not meet every group's needs? Since a student's social context plays a significant role in his or her development, some would argue that educational programs must be specifically designed to accommodate needs.

According to education analyst Shlomo Swirsky, some of the factors that contributed to the historically low educational achievement of Sephardi children were a shortage of teachers in developing towns and settlements, inadequate teacher qualification, poor educational facilities, a curriculum that was foreign and strange to the children, and the alienation of parents.

Clearly, social and developmental factors need to be taken into account in an assessment of the Shas school system.

As well, a comparison of Shas schools with other Israeli educational systems would better reflect Israel's current education atmosphere by providing a more global picture.

In a political battle encompassing various ideologies, however, a decision should be made based on what is in the best interest of the children rather than on the political agenda.

New sources available

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

In 1989, American Jewish genealogist Miriam Weiner wrote a letter to a regional museum in Priluki, Ukraine, requesting information on any Jewish documents there.

Just 10 years ago, relations between western and Iron Curtain countries were still affected by the deep freeze of the Cold War. Throughout the 1980s, relatively few Jewish genealogists even attempted to correspond with archives in communist countries. Positive responses were rare and considered remarkable exceptions to the usual prevailing silence.

In Weiner's case, her letter fell into the hands of Natalia Elkin, a Jewish woman who worked in the Priluki museum. Elkin translated the letter and took it to the town hall, where she found many documents pertaining to Weiner's family, including a birth certificate for Miriam Odnopozov, Weiner's maternal grandmother.

"At that time," Weiner writes in her new book, Jewish Roots in Ukraine and Moldova, "access to this sort of material was more wishful thinking than reality, and seeing my grandmother's name in Natalia's letter brought me to tears." Ultimately, she located more than 50 family documents through this vital Priluki connection.

Documenting one family tree in such detail is a wonderful accomplishment. But Weiner did not stop there. A professional family tree researcher from New Jersey whose company, Routes to Roots, pioneered Jewish genealogical research trips to Poland and Ukraine, Weiner began to keep inventories of all materials of Jewish provenance that could be located in the countries of Eastern Europe in which she travelled and did her work.

Her book Jewish Roots in Poland, which came out last year, provides an unprecedented listing of Jewish genealogical sources. It is also an outstanding picture-book and memorial album to a vanished world.

Recently published by Weiner's Routes to Roots Foundation, in conjunction with New York's esteemed YIVO Institute, Jewish Roots in Ukraine and Moldova is a unique and unprecedented window into the former Jewish civilizations of Ukraine and Moldova (previously known as Bessarabia).

The book contains inventories of Jewish materials, including civil records, tax and voter lists and much more, in some 1,400 shtetls and towns. But it's much more than a dry archival catalogue.

For me, the strength of the book is its vast collection of about 1,000 photographs, most in full color. Those who have seen Jewish Roots in Poland know that it is packed with photographs. Jewish Roots in Ukraine and Moldova has more. They illuminate Jewish life not only in major cities such as Kiev, Odessa, Lvov, Kishinev, Zhitomir, Berdichev and Brody, but also hundreds of lesser-known places such as Nemirov, Sudilkov, Soroki and Priluki.

Town squares, Jewish cemeteries, old and beautiful synagogues that did not survive the Nazi era, Holocaust memorials, tombstones and more tombstones ... evocative and poignant, they ultimately tear at your heartstrings, and bring Jewish history to life.

Chapters were contributed by a number of local authorities. For example, the book introduces Rabbi Moishe Leib Kolesnik of Ivano-Frankovsk (Stanislawow Province), who has collected many books and documents pertaining to local Jewish history, including some passport applications rescued from a dumpster.

Rich with history, illustrated with many maps and examples of documents, Jewish Life in Ukraine and Moldova can only be regarded as a colossal achievement and an outstanding addition to our resources. You don't have to have roots in these countries to appreciate Miriam Weiner's second magnum opus in as many years.

New president set to promote Jewish libraries

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Zena Glassman, newly elected president of the Ontario chapter of the Association of Jewish Libraries (OAJL) is determined to make her organization better known.

Glassman, librarian at Beth Tzedec Synagogue's Max and Beatrice Wolfe Library, says her goal during her two-year term is to highlight the association and "make people understand that we are there to help.

"We offer a place where members can share their professional concerns, needs or successes, and where we can learn from each other. We provide a sense of belonging and professionalism for Jewish librarians," she says.

Zena Glassman

OAJL is part of the Association of Jewish Libraries, an international association started up in 1965 in order to deal with Jewish librarianship issues in places such as universities, Holocaust museums, schools, community centres, and public libraries with Judaica sections.

Chapter members come mostly from the Toronto area, but some are in Ottawa, St. Catharines and Hamilton. "Membership is not restricted to libraries. Any information professional specializing in Judaica can benefit from our services," says Glassman.

Many small libraries such as those in synagogues, she says, are staffed by technicians or volunteers, not professional librarians. "These people have varying levels of experience and they often need help running the library. That is where our organization comes in."

All members receive the quarterly Association of Jewish Libraries Newsletter which contains book reviews, information on library accreditation and updates on current issues. "Members can post questions on a Web site, and a bibliography bank is available."

The association also provides on-site evaluations, runs programs and lectures, and assists people who are computerizing their library.

Gloria Jacobs, past president of OAJL says that association members who attend the annual convention "have an incredible opportunity to meet people working in other organizations. We are still small enough to be able to make contact with people at all levels of the organization."

As well, says Glassman, the organization has developed standards for Jewish libraries, and will help members bring their libraries up to professional standards, and become accredited by the association. "After they are accredited, they are presented with a certificate at the annual convention. It really gives them nachas to have their library highlighted," Glassman says.

Holy Blossom Temple's Sisterhood Library, headed by librarian Anne Dublin, vice-president of OAJL, recently received advanced accreditation for its achievements, Glassman says.

Glassman often gets calls from librarians in small communities who want to model their library after the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Library, which, she says, is known for its high professional standards and up-to-date selections. "They can come and speak to me or board chair Marjorie Rasky, and we will show them how the library is set up, and discuss our circulation and acquisition policies.

"Our aim is to help libraries achieve a certain level of professionalism and receive recognition for the job they are doing."

Volunteers needed

Puppets do the talking to educate children ages 4-14 about drug awareness, substance abuse and HIV/AIDS. People with enthusiasm and an ability to relate to young people make great volunteers. There is an eight-week training program. The commitment is for ½ day a week for the school year. Volunteer Centre of Toronto-North York 631-6117.

Baycrest Centre will be offering a volunteer chaplain training program starting this October and is presently recruiting volunteers to participate in this program. Training will include such information as the aging process, long-term care service delivery and the role of a volunteer chaplain. Volunteers will offer clients an opportunity to discuss spiritual issues and receive support from already trained volunteer chaplains. Must be available once a week for six months for training and at least a year commitment. Sandy Frankel, 785-2500, ext. 2576.

Earlscourt Child and Family Centre needs caring and committed volunteers. You can make a difference in a child's life! Contact Volunteer Department, 654-8981.

Baycrest Centre is looking for volunteers once a week to record patient's behaviors when transferring to and from a wheelchair. Research background and computer skills would be an asset. This would be an excellent opportunity for a psychology student or someone who has an interest in rehabilitation medicine. 785-2500, ext. 2576.

UJA Federation Welcomes Barrett Back

The head of one of the world's leading financial institutions and one of Canada's most well-known banking personalities will be addressing an audience of leading UJA Federation supporters.

Matthew Barrett, former CEO and Chairman of the Bank of Montreal, is returning to Toronto for the highly anticipated visit only months after assuming his new position as Chief Executive Officer of Barclays Bank P.L.C. in London. Barrett, who resigned from his high profile position last February after 37 years at the Bank of Montreal, earned a worldwide reputation for achieving record-breaking corporate profits and changing the landscape of Canadian banking.

In addition to his professional responsibilities, Matthew Barrett, shown here in Ottawa, also works on behalf of hospitals, business groups and other organizations.

CP Picture Archives. (Tom Hanson).

The topic of Barrett's evening address, at the Royal Ontario Museum, October 14, will be Trends in Global Financial Services and the Impacts on Canada.

"Matthew is a true visionary," notes Greg Wolfond, who is co-chairing Barrett's speaking engagement with Paul Godfrey and Neil Nisker. "We are very pleased to have the opportunity to hear, first hand, his personal insights and perspectives."

Colourful Creations By Chihuly

During the opening week of an exhibit of his vibrantly coloured glass sculptures at the Sandra Ainsly Gallery in Toronto, world renowned artist Dale Chihuly spoke to UJA Federation Hineni donors at a private luncheon. Chihuly talked about his internationally acclaimed series of works currently on display in Jerusalem.

Ben-Gurion Society Established

UJA Federation has launched a brand new initiative to recognize generous young adult contributors.

Inspired by the vision of Israel's first Prime Minister, the Ben-Gurion Society is designed to acknowledge dedicated young leaders through unique educational programming and networking opportunities. Close to 400 Toronto area adults under age 45, who have contributed at least $1,000 to the UJA Federation annual campaign, now count themselves among the thousands of North American Ben-Gurion Society (BGS) members.

At the recent BGS launch coinciding with the opening of UJA Federation's Campaign 2000, members chatted with CNN White House correspondent Wolf Blitzer. "People are still telling me what a great time they had," says Tammy Anklewicz, who is co-chairing BGS with Gil Palter. Anklewicz believes other high quality programs planned for this year will encourage new contributors, as well as existing donors, to strengthen their commitment to UJA Federation. "We are very proud of this new venue for recognizing future leaders."

Ben-Gurion Society members have demonstrated a deep commitment toward UJA Federation through their gifts and involvement," adds BGS member Michael Shiner. "Meaningful acknowledgment of their efforts will only enhance their important role in the future of the community."

Other UJA Federation Young Leadership programs include the highly successful Hands On Toronto community service project and the bi-annual International Young Leadership Conference.

For more information about the Ben-Gurion Society, call Avi Benlolo, Director of Young Leadership at (416) 631-5688.

Volunteer Appreciation

UJA Federation is showing appreciation to hundreds of its canvassers at a preview screening of one of the most talked about movies at the Toronto International Film Festival.

"The Campaign is still in full swing but we didn't want to wait until the end to show our dedicated volunteers how important they are," says Agi Mandel, who is chairing the Volunteer Recognition event on September 22.

UJA Federation canvassers are being treated to a screening of Jakob The Liar, a film about the Holocaust starring Robin Williams, at the Varsity Theatre two days before its official release to the public. "This is a great perk for our hard-working campaigners, as well as a good incentive for them to keep up the momentum so we can reach our goal," adds Mandel.

The Campaign's first set of Answer the Call telethons took place last week, adding an additional $1 million to the $15 million raised so far.

Yiddish classes offered for adults, children

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Children and adults attending Yiddish classes will participate in the events celebrating 1,000 years of Yiddish being sponsored by the committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation.

"We want everybody to take part in this celebration," said Naomi Miller-Tureck, committee co-ordinator.

An unprecedented revival in Yiddish is expected as a result of the fall term's adult classes, from October to December, in many locations.

A total of at least 75 children are expected to enrol in the free of charge Sunday morning classes at Associated Hebrew Day School, 6100 Leslie St., between Cummer Avenue and Steeles Avenue East.

The classes run from 9.30 a.m. to noon and cover junior kindergarten to Grade 8. All children in the Greater Toronto Area are eligible.

The classes are funded by the Toronto District School Board and UJA Federation's committee for Yiddish, as part of the Heritage Language and Culture program.

Three new adult courses are being introduced this year, including Yiddish for beginners with Hindy Abelson, Level 1, which starts Monday, Oct. 4, 7 to 9 p.m., at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC). No prior knowledge of Yiddish is needed.

Other new adult classes are Yiddish Literature in Translation, beginning Tuesday, Oct. 5, 1.30 to 3.30 p.m., at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, led by Ellie Moidel; and History of the Yiddish Language, beginning in October, date, time and location to be announced, with Richard Bassett. These two courses are given in English.

Special Sunday adult classes for beginners, levels 1 and 2, start Sunday, Oct. 10, at Associated Hebrew School, in the same location as the children's classes. They will cover Yiddish conversation, grammar and culture through songs, poetry and humor. Those with some knowledge of Yiddish will attend classes from 9.30 to 11.30 a.m., while those with no knowledge have classes from noon to 2 p.m.

A weekday class from 9.30 to 11.30 a.m. in Yiddish, intermediate, Level 2, beginning Tuesday, Oct. 5, will be held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue led by Ellie Moidel.

Another weekday course in Yiddish, beginners, Level 1, starting in October, will be held from noon to 2 p.m., with Richard Bassett, day and location to be announced.

Evening classes will be held from 7 to 9 p.m., in levels 1 and 2, beginning Tuesday, Oct. 5, at Workmen's Circle, with levels 2 and 3 beginning Wednesday, Oct. 6, at the same time. Levels 3 and 4 will begin Thursday, Oct. 7, at the same time and location. All these classes will be taught by Richard Bassett.

Advanced Yiddish, Level 1, begins Wednesday, Oct. 6, at UJPO, Morris Winchevsky School, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., from 7 to 9 p.m. with Ellie Moidel.

The fee for the 10-week adult classes is $70, while the fee for Yiddish 2 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue is the same but $35 for seniors.

THE TORONTO JEWISH HEALING PROJECT

The purpose of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project is to publicize and promote programmes, activities, and resources from a Jewish perspective for those seeking spiritual, physical and emotional healing.

The Toronto Jewish Community has recognized that Judaism has an enormous amount to say about illness and healing through the study of sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, midrash, music, ritual and stories

"Al Tifrosh Min Hatzibur- Do not separate yourself from the community." is never more important than at a time of illness.

Jewish tradition recognizes that, though there is never less to healing than what medical science is capable of, there is more to "healing" than what medicine offers.

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project is not affiliated with any stream of Judaism. It focuses on addressing human needs through the lens that Judaism can offer.

Freak accident fails to slow Jewish composer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dan Mazor has learned to think of his body as a car that needs frequent "five-point checks" if he wants to maintain it in top condition.

The strategy is working for the 32-year-old composer and music producer, who was paralyzed below the neck in a freak accident almost three years ago. Mazor works approximately five hours a day in a home studio built to meet his needs.

Earlier this year he was commissioned to compose the music – a modern rock/pop piece – for a June wheelchair race in Hamilton.

He donated his services for the fund-raiser, and has worked with about 10 paying clients since his injury.

One of his recent productions is a CD of club dance music, Hey Mickey. Now Mazor is working on an album of his own, which will synthesize technology with recorded live music.

He has enough business to support himself, he said in a recent interview.

In October 1996, on a vacation in Cuba, Mazor – who then co-ran his own company, Prime Time Studios – was struck and flipped by a wave while standing in knee-deep water.

The accident damaged his second and third vertebrae, paralyzing him below the neck and necessitating surgery before he could be flown home.

After three months in the Neurological Intensive Care Unit of Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre and almost a year at West Park Hospital, Mazor moved into the basement of his parents' Richmond Hill home. Provincial government funding made it possible to build the studio and make the house wheelchair accessible.

Mazor's days begin when an attendant gets him up, washed and dressed, a process that takes about two hours.

To compose music, Mazor sits in his sip-and-puff wheelchair in front of two color computer screens, wearing a headset that uses infrared technology to control what appears onscreen.

He uses a mouthpiece to work synthesizers and volume control mixers. A soundproof recording booth for clients is steps away.

Mazor uses the same equipment as before the accident, he said, "but to compose a piece of music in which I used to use my hands on a keyboard, now takes a month. I'm still trying to get faster at it.

"Each of these blocks represents a different instrument," he explained, indicating onscreen shapes representing guitar, base and drums. "I'll pick an instrument and then plop in each note. Because I used to play, I know what I want to hear."

Mazor's schedule includes four to five trips a week to Lyndhurst Fitness Centre for rehabilitation workouts. He has motorized pedals under his work table so he can "bicycle" and work his leg muscles.

If a cure is discovered for his condition, he wants to be prepared (by preventing muscle atrophy through exercise), but he's more concerned with everyday life, he said.

"I don't sit and freak out. I'm over that grieving period." He has had a few temporary medical setbacks, but on the whole his health has been "quite good," he said.

"He's very strong," noted Mazor's mother Dorit.

Getting out of the house helps him socially and mentally, he added.

Since the accident, he has regained some movement in his arms. "I can't lift a glass, but I can exercise my limbs, at least...get some circulation going."

He has also progressed from relying on a ventilator to using one only occasionally if he is tired.

Meeting others who have suffered spinal cord injuries has helped him adjust, as has his girlfriend Susie, whom he met when she was volunteering at West Park. "Just having her around" was good for him, he said.

"I lead a pretty busy life and it's independent as much as possible. And it's productive. That's the most important thing to me."

Two former servicemen reunite after 54 year absence

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Watching the two men laughing as they kibitzed with each other on a recent summer evening, one would think they saw each other on a regular basis.

But this get-together was the first time they had seen each other in 54 years.

A story in The CJN in December about a 1945 Chanukah party for child survivors in Hamburg, organized by Canadian Jewish airmen, helped reunite the two men.

Both in their mid-70s, Richard (better known as Micky) Goldberg, and Melville (known as Moish to old friends) Goldberg – they're not related – had served overseas in the air force during World War II.

They met in Great Britain during the summer of 1944 and became reacquainted at the end of the war when they were both posted in the same occupation unit near Hamburg, Germany in 1945.

Richard, a Montrealer now living in Toronto, said the Jewish men in this unit had grown close as a result of their involvement helping Jewish children in Hamburg who had survived the war.

He explained that he and another serviceman, Samuel Kirshner, now deceased, had spearheaded a project to feed these children, but all the other Jewish men had helped out in some way.

He said he and Kirshner had discovered some 25 Jewish children in Hamburg; they decided to help them by getting all the Jewish servicemen in their unit to donate food for distribution to the young survivors.

The food in the mess hall was awful, and so the men would rely on the packages of food they received from their families, Richard said. "Everyone was getting packages from home. It was a pleasure to eat real food again.

"But these guys were giving up their packages – we collected 20 parcels a week.

"We only asked Jewish airmen. Had we asked others they might have given too, but it was easier to ask the Jewish men because the food was for Jewish children."

Richard said it was easier to form friendships with other Jewish soldiers."It was a normal thing for the Jewish boys to get together and to be friendly together."

He became particularly close with Melville, he said.

"He was part of the group that helped the German Jewish kids. He was one of those who donated packages like all the Jewish guys in the unit.

"We were friends back in the air force until I was repatriated to Canada."

The Toronto-born Melville, a long-time Ottawa resident, recalled meeting Richard back in 1944.

He noted that they always stood next to each other in the line-up because they had the same last name; their friendship "took off from there."

Melville said they renewed their friendship, which he described as a light-hearted one, when they were stationed in Germany a year later.

"In all we knew each other for about a year."

In January of 1946 Richard returned to Canada; Melville left a month later.

And while they tried to maintain contact, their correspondence ended shortly after the birth of Richard's son, Melville said, explaining that they both got busy with their lives, – he went to school, and became a lawyer for the federal government and Richard ran a large printing business.

Both men tried to locate the other, Melville said. "I thought of him several times [over the years.] I used to go into Montreal and I tried to find him. Micky tried to find me in Toronto. He was unaware that I left in 1959. It's one of those things, like star-crossed lovers."

He said he was very excited when he saw The CJN article on the Chanukah party in Hamburg and he immediately contacted the newspaper. "This was a heaven-sent opportunity. It was a great moment. I called him as soon as I got his number.

"It was a great pleasure. After 55 years we are still compatible… The affinity apparently is still present. We got along then and we get along now.

"He didn't have any idea of what I had been doing the last half century… We planned our get-together and we swapped 50 years of history."

Richard said, "The surprise of my life came when I got the phone call. It was Chanukah time and I was down in Florida... Our first conversation on the telephone was as if we just parted company the day before.

"All these years had gone by and we hit it off again. [Now] we've met our respective wives…

"It was really a pleasure. I had lost track of him and out of the clear blue sky he reappeared."

CORRECTION

A photo caption in last week's CJN erroneously identified as David Fluss a man carrying a Torah dedicated to the new Chabad centre on Flamingo Road in Thornhill. The man was not Fluss, who dedicated the Torah in the name of his parents and father-in-law.

The CJN regrets the error.

Greater Toronto Area

City apologizes for exhibit

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The City of Toronto has apologized for a photo exhibit that angered Jews last week.

"I have no problem with issuing an apology," Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman told The CJN last Thursday. "If it were up to me, this wouldn't have happened at all.

"And nothing like this will happen again," Lastman pledged.

The exhibit, which was displayed for five days until last Friday in the rotunda at City Hall, was mounted by the Friends of Sabeel, a pro-Palestinian group.

The two dozen or so large black-and-white photographs with accompanying captions showed Israeli troops as aggressors, and Palestinian women and children as victims. They evoked images of the intifadah, the Palestinian uprising of the late 1980s and early '90s.

The display, titled When the Stones Cry Out: The Palestinian Experience, 1948-1998 – Dispossession, Diaspora and Occupation, was erected Sept. 13 and slated to run until last Friday, Sept. 17.

The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) called the exhibit "offensive and highly inappropriate," and said its timing, coinciding with the High Holy Days, was "particularly insensitive."

CJC said it received several complaints.

Susanne Borup, executive director of facilities and real estate for the City of Toronto, said that while the photos were "well done and compelling," her department requested that four captions be changed, just one day before the exhibit was slated to end.

Those captions referred to "Jews," and Borup said her department asked they be changed to refer to "Israelis," or "the Israeli government."

Borup said the Friends of Sabeel agreed to the changes.

But according to Lastman, the offending captions were taken down, and not replaced.

Borup also apologized for the display.

It was "highly insensitive, particularly at this time of year."

She said "chaos" resulting from the creation of one megacity was responsible for the display's approval.

As a result, new guidelines will be developed for access to public space and facilities by multicultural and ethnic groups, she said.

Harold Brief, who chairs the Israel affairs committee of CJC's Ontario region, called the exhibit "crass propaganda" and said it was offensive, especially during the High Holy Day period.

The Sabeel Centre was founded in Jerusalem in 1990 by a group of Christians to promote the Palestinian view of the Israeli capital.

Last November at a conference in Ottawa, Canon Naim Ateek, founder and director of the Sabeel Centre, caused a stir when he said Jews use the Holocaust to "silence criticism of unjust policies in Israel."

סרט במהירות כפולה:

ישראל, מפרחק של אוקיאנוס, נראית כמו סרט שמריצים אותו במהירות כפולה - Fast Forward, ושהכפתור של Play, שאמור להזיז את הסרט במהירות נורמאלית מקולקל. עוד לפני כחודשיים - נבואות כלכליות שחורות. מיתון גובר, אבטלה, גרעון, ממש לא טוב. והנה עכשיו, לקראת ראש השנה, מכריז נגיד בנק ישראל, האיש השמרני והזהיר ביותר במערכת הכלכלית - שישראל נמצאת על סף נס כלכלי, עליית מדרגה, גידול בתוצר הלאומי. בחדשיים האחרונים חלה עליה בגבית המסים ובשאר סממנים של יציאה ממיתון. בהחלט בשורות טובות לעיתון של ראש השנה

סוף לחופש השב"כ:

בית המשפט העליון פסק נחרצות לפני ימים אחדים ששירות הביטחון הכללי (שב"כ), אינו רשאי יותר לענות אסירים בצורה פיזית או אחרת. בצד האחד של המתרס - חגגו כל מפגיני זכויות האזרח, מניני הדמוקרטיה ומי לא. ומן הצד השני - מתלבטת מערכת הביטחון עמוקות איך לטפל בטירור הערבי שלוע לדמוקרטיה. האם אפשר יהיה - ללא שיטות עינוי פיזיות - למצוא טרוריסטים בטרם יפוצצו מכוניות תופת בערים הגדולות, בטרם יחטפו חיילים ובטרם ירצחו אזרחים. ימים יגידו. מצד אחד ההגיון הבריא אומר "חקם להרגך השכם והרגו". ומן הצד השני - ברור גם שבדרך למציאת האמת מעניש שרותי הביטחון הרבה אזרחים ערבים ופלשתינאים על לא עוול בכפם. אינני מקנא במי שצריך יהיה למצוא איזון בין שני הכוחות המנוגדים האלה.

שלושה סיפורי אהבה:

יעל הדיה, ילידת 1964 היא כוכבת חדשה בתחום הספרות "הרצינית" בישראל (להבדיל מכותבי ספרי בלש ורינגול).צעירה (יחסית) ירושלמית, היא למדה פילוסופיה באוניברסיטה העברית, ספרות אנגלית וכתיבה יוצרת באוניברסיטת ניו- יורק. היא עבדה כעיתונאית בכמות שונות. כולל "ידיעות אחרונות" ו"כל העיר".

"שלושה סיפורי אהבה" הוא סיפרה השני, והסיפורים חזקים ומפתיעים. בכולם המריר רב על המתוק, אבל יש גם אופטימיות והרבה אהבה לאנשים. הנה קטע מ"חיות מחמד", שמספר על סיפור אהבה בין שני אנשים דרך עיניו של כלב רחוב שאימצו:

"הוא היה כלב ביישן, והשכנים התפלאו שבוקר אחד קם מן המחצלת שלו, התנפל על הזקנה שטיפסה במדרגות עם הסלים שלה ותלש לה את האוזן.. הזקנה חיבבה אותו, ולפעמים התעבבה לידו כשחזרה מהשוק ובחרה בשבילו משהו מן הסל, גרון של עוף, פרוסת גבינה צהובה, או נקניק או עוגיה עם שומשום, שהשליכה על המחצלת שלו".

בהחלט פתיחה מסקרנת שעושה חשק לקרוא - מה גורם לכלב להיות כל-כך "כפוי טובה" בהמשך!

מומלץ, מומלץ.

Jewish school enrolment continues decline in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the second year in a row, there is a 10 percent drop in enrolment at Gray Academy which is located at the Asper Jewish Community Campus. The school, which runs from junior kindergarten to Grade 12, is under the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

This year's student population is 660 as compared to 760 last September, and 850 when the unified school system opened at the new campus in September 1997.

BJE business manager Jack Cipilinsky cites demographic factors as one of the reasons for the continuing decline in student numbers. "Six years ago," he says, "the Prairie Research group projected that there would be fewer little ones in the community.

"That has turned out to be accurate. The younger kids just aren't out there in large numbers. That is something we have no control over."

At the higher grades, the Gray Academy has been hurt by the University of Winnipeg's decision two years ago to open a Grade 10 program. Reportedly, about half the students attending the University of Winnipeg high school program are Jewish.

While the BJE has experienced a steady decline in enrolment, the south Winnipeg Hebrew Bilingual program at Brock Corydon School continues to thrive. The public school, which offers kindergarten to Grade 6 classes, has 183 students registered this year as compared to 175 last fall.

"We added a second Hebrew kindergarten class this year," says principal Doug Taylor. "Otherwise, our student population is stable."

A new alternative in Jewish schooling in south Winnipeg is the Ohr HaTorah Primary Years Hebrew Day School which is being housed for now at the Herzlia Adas Yeshurun Synagogue.

Ohr HaTorah opened its doors last September with a combined nursery/kindergarten class of about 10 students. For September 1999, a Grade 1 class has been added. There are 18 students enrolled at the school – one Grade 2 student, six children in Grade 1, four in kindergarten and seven in nursery.

Ohr HaTorah was started by a group of parents who were looking for a more traditional Jewish educational for their children. When efforts to work out an arrangement with the Winnipeg BJE failed to succeed, the parents set out to create their own institution.

The founding parents were able to link up with the Torah Mesorah system, an international network of Jewish day schools with headquarters in New York City.

Torah Mesorah is providing the curriculum, supervision and a large chunk of the funding for Ohr HaTorah. In two years the school will be eligible for government grants. New private schools have to be in operation for three years before the provincial government will provide funding.

In north Winnipeg, which has a smaller Jewish population, some families bus or drive their children to the Gray Academy.

The other alternative is the north Winnipeg Hebrew Bilingual program at Margaret Park School which goes from kindergarten to Grade 6.

This year, enrolment in the program is down to 100 students as compared to 109 last year. The decline is mainly due to the fact that the incoming kindergarten class is smaller than the Grade 6 class that graduated in June. As well, at least two families have left the city. On the positive side, the children in the kindergarten are, for the most part, the oldest in their families.

The north end also has a Chabad School with 25 students, most of whom are children of Chabad Families in Winnipeg. Incidentally, for the first time ever, Rabbi Avraham Altein, Winnipeg's Lubavitch Rabbi, is teaching the yeshiva track at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the Gray Academy's high school component.

Saskatchewan cemetery commemorates history of Jewish settlement

By HELENE KESTEN
Special to The CJN

REGINA — Rural Saskatchewan is not known for its Jewish population, but during the last century there was a flurry of Jewish colonization in that area.

At one time, the largest Jewish community in Saskatchewan was in Hirsch, which was founded in 1892 with the arrival of 47 families. The first community in Canada established by the Jewish Colonization Agency, it took its name from its patron, Baron Maurice de Hirsch.

Close to 150 Jewish pioneers and their children were buried in the cemetery at Hirsch, which was consecrated as a historic site in 1980 through the efforts of a former Hirsch-area farmer, Alec Muscovitch.

Largest community was in Hirsch

The last person buried there was Michael Schopp in 1970. His grave faces east towards Jerusalem, along with those of others who lived in the community, such as Rebecca Dubinsky, Himie Barnblat, Israel Berner, Solomon and Ida Muscovitch, and Judah Blank.

As a result of the intervention of a Jewish family still living in the Hirsch area, the Kleimans of Bienfait, the Saskatchewan Jewish Council has provided yearly upkeep and maintenance for the cemetery, a landmark which is part of our Jewish history.

The memorials in the Hirsch cemetery not only commemorate the lives of individuals, but also the history of Hirsch and Jewish settlement in Saskatchewan.

Time and the elements have taken a toll on the markers that serve as a reminder of the lives of the Hirsch pioneers, and an attempt is being made to repair and restore the gravesites before that part of our history is gone forever.

For more information about restoring the cemetery, call or fax Kesten at Saskatchewan Jewish Council, 306-569-8166; or contact her by e-mail at Hkesten@hotmail. com.

Book a poignant look at mother-daughter relationship

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — While still grieving the loss of a beloved daughter, Sarah Swedler was determined to make sure that something good would come from the tragedy.

Together with Elaine Medline, she has written a book, Ina's Way: A Story of Courage and Love, which tells the story of her daughter Ina Swedler McCarthy's life and death. Swedler McCarthy, a diabetic, died three years ago at the age of 30 from complications following transplant surgery.

The net proceeds from the sale of the book will be donated to the Ina Swedler McCarthy Memorial Fund at the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation (Canada.) Swedler McCarthy was diagnosed with diabetes when she was 10 years old.

Three years ago, she was the subject of the Yom Kippur sermon at Congregation Machzikei Hadas. Acknowledging to the congregation that he had the family's permission to talk about Swedler McCarthy in his sermon, Rabbi Reuven Bulka discussed organ donations.

He explained that Swedler McCarthy was, at the time the sermon was delivered, in Toronto, recuperating from transplant surgery. She had been the recipient of both a kidney and a pancreas. He urged the members of his congregation to consider the importance of donating an organ in order to save a life.

However, something went awry following the surgery. To this day, it is not known what went wrong with the transplant, but within days, Swedler McCarthy took a turn for the worse and died.

"Rosh Hashanah used to be the happiest time of year," says Swedler. "There was always laughter and the house was filled with people. Now this is the hardest time of the year for me."

Swedler McCarthy left a young son, Josh, and it is for her grandson, that Swedler wrote this book, she says. "I want her memory to remain alive and it is all for Josh, so he will know always how loved she was by so many people."

Swedler McCarthy was already very ill when she gave birth to Josh, but she never complained, says her mother. "Her love for Josh was beyond anything she could ever have imagined. Josh is the legacy she left us."

This book tells the story of a young girl, full of life, who did not allow the diagnosis of diabetes to stand in her way. She lived life to the fullest and knew no boundaries. She was determined to accomplish whatever she set her mind to. Swedler McCarthy was a gymnast; she went to summer camp; she travelled the world.

As a journalist, Swedler McCarthy made a name for herself in her brief career and is fondly remembered by many colleagues and readers of the various publications where she worked. Much has been written about her and a number of scholarships and awards have been established in her name.

For the past three years, a charity golf tournament has been held in Swedler McCarthy's memory and the proceeds have been used to furnish and equip the diabetes teaching room at the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario which was, for many years, her second home. This is one of the ways which her mother hopes to bring some good to the world from Swedler McCarthy's death.

The book is a poignant look at the relationship of a mother and daughter with the added burden of a potentially life-threatening illness hanging over them. It is a book filled with love and hope and when, at the end, hope turns to despair, the reader feels the pain, and cries along with those who have lost a loved one.

Ina's Way: A Story of Courage and Love can be found at Chapters and other book stores and is also available from the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation. "If two people read this book and get something out of it, I will feel very happy," says Swedler.

Birthright Israel offers trips to Israel only Israel experience. You're planting the seed," said Sokolsky.

Karen Morton, newly appointed chair of Birthright Israel Canada, believes the trips to Israel will positively affect students.

"Israel experiences have proven to be a very effective tool for strengthening Jewish identity, developing strong relationships with Israel, and providing an opportunity for Jewish youth to meet one another in a powerful non-formal Jewish educational setting," Morton said.

A 1995 American study finds that those people who travel to Israel during college are more involved in Jewish life than those who have never travelled to Israel and they are also more engaged than those who make a first trip at a younger age.

While the trips are meant as an introduction for those who have never been to Israel, young adults who have travelled there are still eligible for the program.

The only people excluded from applying are those who have already been on an organized educational tour of Israel with their peers.

The deadline for application is October 21, 1999. To apply or for information, call your local Jewish Campus Services or Hillel office or Israel Experience office in your city or dial 1-800-567-4772. Information is available at http://www.israelexperience.org.

American university-aged students will be participating in Israel tours during January winter break 2000. Birthright Israel may introduce Israel trips for high school students in 2001.

Bell's back in Israel as new ambassador

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It will be a case of déjà vu when Michael Bell, Canada's new ambassador to Israel, presents his credentials to President Ezer Weizman sometime in the next few weeks.

Bell, a 56-year-old diplomat whose specialty is the Middle East, returned to Tel Aviv this week, just after Yom Kippur, to take up his old post. His predecessor, David Berger, left Israel last month.

In 1992, when Bell was into his second year as Canada's envoy in Israel, he was suddenly recalled and replaced by a political appointee, Norman Spector, the first Jew to be appointed to that position.

"I was disappointed to leave, but we are in a rotational service," said Bell, a mild-mannered man who was subsequently given the title of senior advisor to the Middle East Refugee Working Group. "I accepted the decision, and what I prefer now is to look at the future."

He paused, gazing into the air. "If I hadn't been yanked out then, I might not be going back [to Israel] now," he said in an interview on the sixth anniversary of the Oslo accords, hours before he and his wife Linda were due to go to Israel by way of Switzerland. They planned to spend about a week in France on his cousin's farm before flying on to Israel.

"I'm awfully glad to be returning," said Bell, who was first secretary and consul at the Canadian embassy in Tel Aviv from 1975 to 1978. "I'm determined that it will be a rewarding three years. It's kind of nice to be going back to a country where you have lots of friends, know the society and feel comfortable. That doesn't happen often in this kind of a career."

As he talked, his wife packed the last of their bags. They were staying with their 30-year-old daughter, a lawyer, who lives in a modest apartment in Forest Hills. "We do not travel light," Linda Bell said jocularly.

Previously ambassador to Egypt (1994-1998) and Jordan (1987-1990), Bell described Canada's relations with Israel as "very, very good and increasingly based on substance," particularly in the economic sphere.

His focus, he explained, will be on expanding the parameters of Canada's free trade agreement with Israel.

Michael Bell

"I'm told that there is a lot of potential to increase bilateral trade. If the volume of trade reaches $1 billion (US) in three years, I might be happy." At present, the figure is $600 million (US).

Bell, fresh from recharging his intellectual batteries at Harvard University, where he studied international relations, said Canadian corporations are far more at ease doing business in Israel since the 1993 Oslo peace process.

"Now it's a pattern rather than an exception," he observed, citing Loblaws – the Ontario-based food retailer – as an example. "I'm going to try to work with large companies to appraise them of the opportunities and markets in Israel."

In his view, Canadian entrepreneurs are interested in a number of areas – high-tech, engineering services, media, telecommunications and real estate, among others.

It's time, he declared, to move past rhetoric and build a substantial bilateral commercial relationship based on mutual interests. When he arrived in Israel in 1990, on his first tour as ambassador, he discovered that the volume of trade had not increased significantly since 1975.

Bell, as well, hopes to expand cultural relations, though he acknowledged that "it's pretty good now." As he put it: "Israel is one of those countries where there is a vibrant interest in the arts. The payoff is big when you bring a Canadian artist to Israel. There is a responsive audience."

As for the peace process, Bell said that Canada's role is two-fold: confidence-building and institution-building.

Canadian diplomats, he said, are helping the Palestinian Authority build a civil society grounded in democratic values and responsive institutions.

"We want a Palestinian entity that is credible internationally and in the eyes of its own people. The success of these efforts will impact on Israel."

Bell, the former director of the Department of Foreign Affairs' Middle East Relations Division, said that he will strive to encourage Arab-Israeli dialogue through the medium of seminars.

During his posting in Cairo, he organized seminars on eco-tourism and solar energy. They were attended by Israeli and Egyptian academics.

"The subject of the seminars was less important than the dynamic of bringing people together," he said. "They break down myths people have about each other. They can change perceptions."

In Tel Aviv, he has every intention of organizing seminars along the same lines to which Israelis, Palestinians, Jordanians and Egyptians will be invited.

Referring to third party participation in the Mideast peace talks, Bell said that Canada cannot play a role like that of the United States. "There is no substitute for the United States. The Americans are the ones both Israel and the Palestinians have confidence in."

And, he added, Washington has the clout to bring Israel and Syria to the negotiating table.

Bell is optimistic that Israel and the Palestinians can resolve their differences, difficult and sensitive issues such as final borders and the status of Jerusalem notwithstanding.

"The fundamental trend on both sides is that the time is ripe to settle this according to the concept of land for peace."

Besides, he said, Israeli and Palestinian leaders have staked their reputations and places in history on the successful outcome of these talks.

Terrorism could derail negotiations, he warned, referring to Hamas. "Terrorism won't disappear. You don't need a lot of people to wreak havoc. Obviously, there are rejectionists who will do their best to see the [peace] process fail. That's a sad fact. As peace gets closer, the rejectionists will grow more desperate."

However, he suggested, there is a trend away "from these people and toward peace" in Palestinian society.

Asked if a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is inevitable, Bell replied, "It seems likely that the results of the negotiations will be that."

Turning to a related subject in which he is superbly versed, Bell expressed optimism that the Palestinian refugee problem, one of the thorniest, can be resolved.

He said Israel and Syria are likely to reach an agreement. "Israel is very realistic about the elements that have to be involved. Syria is ready for some pretty significant adjustments."

The elements of a peace treaty, he pointed out, are already in place. "Now it depends on whether they can be put together."

To widen his horizons and, perhaps, to prepare himself for the ambassadorship, he spent a year at Harvard examining global and Middle Eastern issues. "It was a feast for the mind," said Bell, who concentrated on the 1991 Gulf War.

Of late, he has read The Jerusalem Post and the English edition of Ha'aretz on the Internet. Bell's grasp of Hebrew and Arabic is problematic. He cannot carry on a conversation in either language. "My ear for languages is not very good."

Prior to departing Canada, he met with journalists, academics and Jewish community officials in Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Winnipeg. He also had a meeting with the Canadian Council of Churches.

Bell, a stockbroker's son, joined the Department of Foreign Affairs in 1967, shortly after graduating from the University of Windsor, where he received a BA in economics and MA in political science.

His first posting abroad was in Jamaica, but after working on peacekeeping he was sent to Israel. Following his return to Ottawa, he helped Robert Stanfield, a former Conservative party leader, prepare a report on Canada-Mideast relations. Stanfield's assignment was triggered by Joe Clark's ill-fated promise to move Canada's embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

Bell, who last visited Israel 18 months ago, seems to have a special affinity for Israel. He said, "I really like the dynamism, informality, complexity and intellectual depth of Israeli life."

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Preston Manning and Joe Clark spent some time together over the past weekend. United Alternative (UA) boosters spun the much hyped encounter as a prelude to a more significant joining in time for the next UA convention next February.

It is sort of an elaborate mating ritual common to some species wherein the two partners gingerly dance around until that fateful bonding moment.

Tories, who have never forgiven the upstart Reformers for destroying the party, dismiss that characterization as nothing more than the fanciful musings of an unrequited lover. Their take on the meetings (there have been a few other discreet contacts over the last few months) is quite different.

Basically, they claim, Clark simply wants to explore those areas where Reform and Tory interests merge. The goal is to present a strategic common front in opposition to the government.

The real subtext is something else entirely – and neither Clark nor Manning can, at this point, do anything about it.

Increasingly, thoughtful activists in both camps recognize that there must be a complete reconciliation between the two right-wing parties. Neither can muster sufficient support on their own and, in many ridings, they cancel each other out letting the Liberals come up the middle.

The revelation that has come to these thoughtful activists is that a merger is not possible with either Clark or Manning at the helm. In other words, in order to move forward, both of them have to be dumped from their respective parties.

At first, these treasonous thoughts were only contemplated in private. Increasingly, however, credible actors on the political right are expressing these heresies in the visible presence of party faithful.

Whether in sports or politics, the true leader knows when the time has come to pass the torch; when one's continued presence is more of a hindrance to the team's objectives than a help.

There are few things as pathetic as an aging athlete clinging to past glories long after the gloves or shoes should have been retired.

The only difference in the analogy is that the boxer only risks his own safety and dignity. In the case of politicians like Joe and Preston, it is the country that will be placed at risk on the alter of their egos.

KlezKanada Yiddish festival proves a success

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

The tremendous renaissance of Yiddish culture and klezmer music over the past two decades has produced, among other things, a number of festivals devoted to eastern European Jewish culture.

From Toronto to New York City, the Catskills to California, South America to Europe and the Middle East, the proliferation of klezmer and Yiddish festivals has revitalized Ashkenazi culture and brought it into the mainstream, subsequently reawakening the cultural consciousness of many Jews.

The third edition of the biennial Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture recently wrapped up in Toronto. Ashkenaz has emerged as the largest festival of its kind in the world, elevating Canada to a high status in the international Yiddish culture scene. But the Yiddish revival in Canada does not begin or end with Ashkenaz. There is another Canadian Yiddish festival which, though more modest in scale and stature, offers as much and in many ways more than Ashkenaz.

KlezKanada is an annual five-day retreat held at Camp B'nai Brith, north of Montreal. The fourth edition of the festival recently took place. By all accounts, it was a smashing success.

KlezKanada is modelled loosely on KlezKamp, the now 15-year-old Yiddish Folk Arts program held each December in New York's Catskill Mountains.

In a camp environment, away from the hustle and bustle of the city, and in the idyllic surroundings of the Laurentian Mountains, more than 500 participants from around the world congregate to take part in five exciting days of music, song, dance, film, seminars, lectures, workshops, and an all-around feeling of warmth and kinship.

One of the most striking characteristics of KlezKanada is the diversity of those in attendance. The festival attracts musicians, artists, actors, film-makers, scholars, and those simply looking to nourish their Jewish souls.

Participants range in age from those born in the pre-war shtetls of Europe to those born on these shores not more than a decade ago. They come from great distances across North America, Europe, and even Australia to partake in the festivities. Many are fluent Yiddish speakers; others can barely speak English.

Despite the participants' diversity, their shared heritage and mutual affection for Jewish music and culture fosters a warm sense of community. Many new friendships are forged, many old ones rekindled.

What distinguishes KlezKanada from Ashkenaz is the former's emphasis on interactive participation and hands-on education in Yiddish arts. While Ashkenaz is primarily a festival of presentation and spectacle by professionals, KlezKanada is more about process than product.

Participants in the festival take part in workshops devoted to klezmer instrumental techniques, Yiddish vocal, songwriting and dancing techniques, and a number of symposiums and films on European Jewish history. Participants also take part in group music ensembles which perform for the entire camp on the final day.

An important component of this emphasis on hands-on instruction and the passing of Yiddish folk art techniques from professionals to amateurs is KlezKanada's scholarship program. This year, KlezKanada invited 48 young people ranging in age from 10 to 30 to attend the festival for free. No other Yiddish festival offers a similar program.

KlezKanada's scholarship program promotes continuity in the culture and the survival of Yiddish folk art forms through their dissemination from experts to young people. As KlezKanada director, Dr. Hy Goldman, constantly reiterates, the young generation represents the future of Yiddish culture. Without their interest and education in these forms, there can be no future for Yiddish culture.

Judging from the enthusiasm and skill demonstrated by the scholarship recipients and other youthful participants at KlezKanada, Dr. Goldman need not worry about the future of Yiddish culture.

The nightly KlezKabaret showcased many young talents to the entire camp. Performances ranged from surprisingly well-articulated versions of Yiddish folk-song standards, to youth-inflected interpretations of klezmer instrumental gems. The strength and quality of these performances verified the inspirational impact that the KlezKanada environment has on the younger participants, many of whom experienced this culture and music for the first time at the camp.

Of course, the young klezniks drew a great deal of inspiration from the wonderful concert performances each night by the faculty musicians and singers. Headliners at the festival included many of the most important figures in today's klezmer and Jewish music scene: Brave Old World (minus Alan Bern), the Epstein Brothers, Khevrisa, Adrienne Cooper, Zalmen Mloteck, German Goldenshteyn, Hankus Netsky, Jeff Warschauer and Debra Strauss, and many others.

Each of these performers put on captivating performances which collectively covered all the bases of Yiddish music, from archaic to progressive, European to American, vocal to instrumental.

The performance highlight of the festival was, as always, the final evening's Groyser Concert, for which an additional 300 guests from Montreal joined in the proceedings. The incredibly diverse concert stretched on for nearly four hours, concluding with another two hours of raucous, intergenerational group dancing, in lines, circles, couples, and various other formations, all under the inspired leadership of Brave Old World's Michael Alpert, an expert in Yiddish dance steps.

In all, KlezKanada is a rousing affirmation of the state of Yiddish culture. This is not a stagnant or nostalgic culture, but a dynamic, evolving tradition. Enlivening the Yiddish neshamah with echoes of the past, chorus of the present, and shades of the future, the KlezKanada organizers ought to be commended for their genuine commitment to community and their continuing nourishment of Yiddish cultural traditions.

'With tears in my eyes, I helplessly watched'

By LEON KRYM
Special to The CJN

After the tragedy of summer 1942, I was in deep shock when I came to realize that my family had been transported to Treblinka.

Fortunately, my older brother Abraham wasn't home when the German SS soldiers deported all the tenants of Swento Jerska N.30 (several hundred) to the Treblinka death camp, including my parents, my younger brother and my sister.

A few days later, my brother Abraham came back to the apartment at night. It was safer to move around the streets of the ghetto in the dark. He already knew of our tragedy and stayed away from the building for several days.

He came with his girlfriend Hanka Shafran. I remember them sitting at the table holding hands and gazing into each other's eyes. On the table was a dimly lit candle illuminating their loving, young and beautiful faces.

I was resting on the bed, with my face buried in the pillow, in tears and grief over the loss of my family. I guess it was easier for my brother to cope with the tragedy that befell us. He had a girlfriend – and being five years older helped too.

When I woke up in the early morning, they were gone. They slipped out of the apartment in the middle of the night, so as not to be seen or detected by German soldiers patrolling the ghetto. The next morning as usual, I left for work in the toothbrush shop. After work, the shop closed and all the Jewish workers were moved out to a transit camp.

In 1942-43, the remaining Jews still living in the Warsaw Ghetto were preparing themselves for an armed fight against the German Nazis.

One day out of nowhere, my brother showed up at the barbed wire fence. We looked at each other from a distance. He waved his hand as if to say his last goodbye. With tears in my eyes, I helplessly watched as he walked away and disappeared into the buildings of the ghetto.

The author in 1945

The author's brother in 1938

Day after day I looked out towards the fence hoping to see him once more. He never came back. I never saw him again.

One day, as expected, we were surrounded by a group of soldiers and taken to the crowded Umschlagplatz. There we could see SS soldiers screaming and with their rifles forcing everybody into the freight trains.

Towards the evening the Umschlagplatz was almost empty. By now most of the people – men, women and children – were shipped out to the Treblinka death camp, making room for the next trainload.

We were still standing in the same place, watching in horror the cruelty, humiliation and suffering being inflicted on innocent people. Finally, a German SS officer approached our group and selected about 20 men to work in a mechanical shop called Ostbahn Ausbesserungswerke. We were housed in barracks and worked maintenance jobs.

This was 1943. The Warsaw Ghetto uprising was in full force. Jewish men and women were fighting fiercely against the German Nazis. At night we climbed the stairs of a higher structure connected to the barracks. From there we could see the flames and heavy smoke rising from the burning ghetto.

After a couple of weeks, the fires died out, and with them went the brave fighters of the Warsaw Ghetto.

One day, our group was transferred to the infamous prison, the Warsaw Pawiak. Every day, we were driven to work at auto garages called Nachschubskommando, and after work we were brought back to the prison.

As the Soviet army advanced towards Warsaw, the garages were liquidated and our entire working group was escorted by German gendarmes – a walking distance – to the Gesia concentration camp.

There, huge trailer trucks loaded with coal arrived at the gates and we unloaded of the black, dusty stuff all day long.

In 1944, the Polish uprising fighters succeeded in taking over the Gesia camp and all the prisoners including myself were freed.

However, the short-lived uprising soon began to fail. As the Germans regained the territory, they ordered all the people hiding out in the camp and vicinity to surrender. I, as a Jew, under no circumstances considered surrendering to the German Nazis. I decided to go underground and stay there until liberated or discovered.

There I got my first rude awakening. While searching for food and a place to relax, I bumped into a dead body hanging by the feet in the ruins of an upper floor apartment. Shocked by the gruesome sight, I left to look elsewhere.

When I heard footsteps coming from a little distance, I thought my prayers were answered. I could tell that they were not steps of soldiers. I called out the secret ghetto code, "tse tse," and the same answer came back. Then I called out the second code "amchoo," which means countryman, and when the same was answered, we knew it was safe to make contact.

After a short conversation with a group of three Jewish men, I was taken into their bunker under the ruins of a destroyed building. There were about seven people in the bunker, including two elderly men, Bernard Goldstein and Mr. Guzik, both high officials in pre-war Jewish society.

After several days, I recovered and became acquainted with the others. Bernard and I were assigned to go out at night into the demolished buildings to search for food. Bernard was carrying a carbide lamp in his hand and I led the way in front of him. As we turned a corner in the basement, we noticed two German soldiers approaching. We froze momentarily. Bernard, in shock dropped to the ground and the carbide lamp went out. I turned around, left the basement and ran away into the darkened and lifeless streets of the Warsaw Ghetto.

Shortly afterwards I got back to my group. We started to look for Bernard, but we never found him nor the carbide lamp.

The year was 1945. Food and water were very scarce. When we spotted pipes on a basement ceiling, we managed to drain every drop of the precious water into a bottle, using it only to stay alive. Under the existing conditions, life as such was hardly bearable.

We decided to walk through a

100-year-old murder full of political intrigue

This year marks the 100th anniversary of an unsolved murder that triggered a landmark blood-libel case and polarized Czech society.

By CHARLES HELLER

Polna is a small market town in the rural Bohemia-Moravia border country. This whole region is known for its beer, wine and pickles. Also renowned for its strong musical tradition, the town was home to Gustav Mahler and many other composers.

On April 1, 1899, the body of 19-year-old Anezka Hruzova was found in a wood nearby Polna.

There was pandemonium when rumors spread that her wounds allegedly bore the marks of kosher slaughter, her blood had been drained, and that the murder was timed to coincide with Passover.

In short, the infamous blood libel, the bizarre belief that Jews used Christian blood to make matzot, had manifested itself in Polna.

If these rumors were to be true, then obviously a Jewish suspect was needed. It was not long before just the right candidate was found – Leopold Hilsner, a native of Polna who was feeble-minded enough to allow himself to be arrested and tried on the flimsiest evidence.

What followed was a classic case of political intrigue and anti-Semitic disturbances, fuelled by inadequate police work, poor cross-examination and biased judgment.

During Hilsner's trial there were anti-Jewish riots in many places. Most of the town's Jews – the community had existed for centuries – moved away. My grandfather Siegfried Heller, however, stayed put, because of his obligations to Hilsner (his legal ward) and to the Jewish community. He was responsible for the Israelite Fraternity (benevolent society).

For many generations, the Heller family had served in Polna as the rychtar zidovsky (Jewish magistrate), a position giving judicial powers over the Jewish community, which at its peak comprised over 10 percent of the entire population of the town.

This position had been specially created by the Austrian Hapsburg princes who ruled over the Czech lands until the creation of the former state of Czechoslovakia in 1918. The Jewish magistrate was the prince's agent for the Jewish community, which fell under his jurisdiction. The Jews were not subject to the city's laws within the ghetto.

Because of the threat of riots, my grandfather moved the Torah scrolls out of the synagogue to his house for safekeeping.

He was in a difficult position. He was defending the Jews against the local Czechs and defending the Czechs against the Austrian authorities. As a supporter of Czech culture he was a pioneer in the local Jewish community by his use of the Czech language. He even invented a Czech form for his own name, Vitezmir.

But the stress proved too much. He died of a heart attack in 1903. His tombstone is inscribed in Czech, standing out from all the ones that surrounds it, which are inscribed in German.

Hilsner was found guilty – the only guilty verdict ever recorded in all the various Austrian blood-libel cases. The death sentence was changed to life imprisonment. However, Hilsner was granted amnesty in 1916 and upon his release from prison he changed his name to Heller.

Hilsner was defended by T.G. Masaryk, an up-and-coming law professor from Charles University in Prague. For his efforts, Masaryk was hounded out of his job.

He then travelled widely on a one-man mission to defend the reputation of the Czechs against the image of backwardness and superstition which the Austrian government, no doubt, promulgated. This heroic stance helped Masaryk win foreign support years later when he helped establish the new Czechoslovak. He became its first president.

The Hilsner case lingered on in the popular imagination. Well into the 1930s people were still suspicious of Hilsner and the Jews. Whenever my father Otto travelled he would never say he came from Polna, because he didn't want to hear people say, "That's where the Jews killed Anezka Hruzova."

Just as with Dreyfus, society was polarized between those who were convinced the case was an anti-Semitic frame-up, and those who genuinely thought the Jews were behind it. The Hilsner Affair came to be called the Czech Dreyfus case.

By the 1930s the Polna Jewish community had dwindled to a few families, not enough to support a rabbi, although the beautiful 17th-century synagogue was still in use. My father fled to England just ahead of the Nazi occupation in 1939. My grandmother died in 1940.

The final blow came in 1942 when the last handful of Jews were transported to the gas chambers. The synagogue became derelict, but some of its contents were preserved, thanks to a perverse Nazi scheme to create a Museum of a Defunct Race.

The scrolls which my grandfather had so carefully protected were shipped to Prague, where together with thousands of others from all over the country they were meticulously catalogued by experts, themselves doomed to perish.

After the war the scrolls were rescued by the Memorial Scrolls Trust of Westminster Synagogue, London. They now have a place of honor in Jewish communities throughout the world.

The collapse of the Communist regime in 1989 has enabled Jewish communities in the west to assist in reconstruction work. Recently an exhibition of Jewish life was mounted in the local regional centre of Jihlava.

The Polna synagogue is now being restored as a cultural centre,which will officially open this November with an exhibition devoted to the Hilsner case. This exhibition is currently running in Prague, and will be followed up with a conference next year.

Anezka Hruzova's grave remains well-tended to this day. In the mid-'60s there was a rumor of a death-bed confession of her murder by an old boy-friend, but this was not taken seriously – her murder is suspected of being one of a series of murders that remain unsolved.

Hot soup always tastes great in the sukkah

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

For a change from chicken soup, you can make soups that use some of the seasonal vegetables like carrots and pumpkin and then thicken them with wild rice and barley.

The trick of keeping hot soup hot in the sukkah is to bring it to the table in a tureen, with a lid of course.

Soup often tastes better after it's had a chance to sit for awhile; so you can make it up a few days ahead of time and freeze it or keep it in the fridge and then warm it.

BARLEY AND WILD RICE SOUP

½ cup pearl barley
½ cup wild rice
1 onion, chopped
½ lb. mushrooms, halved or quarter
2 medium potatoes, cubed
4-5 cups vegetable or chicken broth
fried onions (garnish)

Combine all the ingredients in a stockpot and bring to a boil, reduce to a simmer, cover and cook for about 45 minutes to one hour. Serve and garnish with fried onions. This is a fast and easy soup that serves 4.

EZ CARROT SOUP

2 lbs. baby carrots
3 stalks celery
2 small red potatoes
1 small onion
2 tbsp. oil
6 cups chicken broth
dash of cumin (to taste)
1 tsp. onion powder
1 tsp. garlic powder
salt and pepper to taste
dill optional

In a stockpot saute the onion, celery and potato in the oil for about 15 minutes. Add the carrots for another 5 minutes, stirring occasionally and then cover with the broth and boil for about 1 hour. Put the whole concoction in a food processor and then back into the pot (you may have to process it in batches). Add garlic powder and onion powder as well as a dash of cumin. Season with salt and pepper. Serve with a dash of dill for garnish on top. Serves 6 to 8.

BURNT ONION AND POTATO SOUP

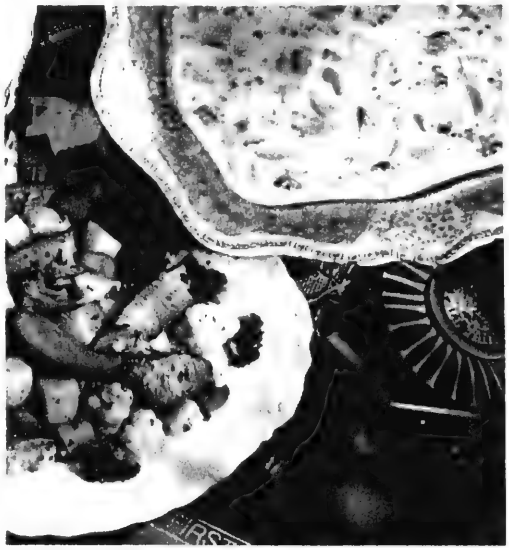
4 cups cubed potatoes
3-4 onions, diced
1-1 ½ cups farfel
1 cup pasta squares (egg noodle squares)
¼ stick of butter or margarine
¼ cup flour mixed with ½ cup water
salt and pepper to taste

In a stockpot fry the onions in butter until very brown but not burned. Add 8 to 9 cups of water. You can add more later if needed.

(The water should be very brown.) Add potatoes and cook for 10 minutes. Add farfel and pasta. Thicken soup with flour/water mixture. Season and simmer for 1 hour. Serves 6.

MUSHROOM BARLEY WILD RICE AND SPINACH SOUP

2 onions, chopped
6 stalks celery, sliced diagonally
4 stalks Chinese cabbage, sliced diagonally (optional)



6 cloves garlic, minced or finely chopped
1 ½ lbs. fresh mushrooms, sliced (any kind you like)
1 can straw or sliced button mushrooms, drained
1 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tbsp. vegetable broth or water
½ cup soy sauce (or tamari)
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar (or rice wine)
1½ cup barley
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
½ lb. fresh spinach, broken into small pieces
2 cups vegetable broth
8 cups water
2 cups cooked wild rice

Spray large pot with vegetable spray. Combine chopped onion, celery, Chinese cabbage, garlic and mushrooms in pot. Sprinkle with the soy sauce and veggie broth and saute for 5 minutes, stirring. Add rest of the ingredients, except wild rice. Bring to a boil, then simmer 2-3 hours. Add the wild rice the last 30 minutes. This is a very thick soup; if it gets too thick after refrigerating, add additional broth or water. This makes a large recipe, so it can be easily halved. Serves 8 to 10 easily.

(The mushroom mixtures are great in this soup. When fresh mushrooms are out of season, I use all canned. This could also be made with chicken broth.)

PUMPKIN, SWEET POTATO, PEANUT BUTTER SOUP

4 tbsp. (½ stick) margarine or butter
4 cups canned pumpkin
2 cup cooked pureed sweet potatoes
1 cup smooth peanut butter
6 cups chicken stock or pareve chicken stock
1 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 tsp. salt
snipped fresh chives, for garnish

Note: Sour cream can be used as a garnish if you use a vegetable stock for a dairy or pareve meal.

Melt the margarine in a soup pot over medium heat. Stir in the pumpkin, sweet potatoes, and peanut butter. Add the stock, pepper, and salt, and stir well until smooth. Reduce the heat to a simmer and cook for 20 minutes.

ROASTED RED PEPPER SOUP WITH ELEPHANT GARLIC AND SWEET BASIL

4-5 red bell peppers
3 cloves elephant garlic
1 cup tomato sauce
2 cups chicken stock or vegetable stock
1 tbsp. honey
lemon pepper
5-6 fresh basil leaves

Barbecue red peppers until skins are charred and shrivelled. Barbecue elephant garlic leaving skins on until soft and quite dark but not burned.

Remove peppers and garlic from barbecue and place in plastic bag. Tie the top and leave in bag about 15 minutes until skins peel off easily from peppers and garlic. Puree peppers and garlic in food processor until thick but not chunky. Toss in basil leaves and puree.

Transfer the puree to a stockpot and add the honey, tomato sauce, chicken stock or vegetable stock. Simmer till heated through, add lemon pepper to season, and adjust chicken stock (or vegetable) to taste. Adjust honey, tomato sauce, and basil to taste.

TORONTO

Probationary Firefighters

New City, New Opportunities

If you like helping people, work well with others, enjoy learning and are physically fit, this is a great time to join the City of Toronto Fire Services. In addition to firefighting services, you will perform rescue work, fire prevention duties, administer first aid, respond to emergency hazardous material situations, and maintain firefighting apparatus, equipment and fire stations. To carry out these duties, you must be able to handle intense, sustained physical effort, communicate clearly in English under stressful situations, and work shifts (including nights and weekends).

Qualified applicants must be legally eligible to work in Canada, meet the prescribed hearing and visual requirements (20/30 in each eye without corrective lenses, and colour vision that is safe for firefighting), and have completed a minimum of Grade 12 (or equivalent as approved by the Ontario Ministry of Education). A valid Ontario driver's licence and the ability to obtain a class D (minimum) with Z brake endorsement by the time of job offer are also essential.

The first stage of the recruitment process is a written test, to be conducted beginning October 20, 1999. For further information on dates, times and locations, and to learn more about the recruitment process, you may do the following:

1. Pick up a recruitment information package, until October 13, 1999, at one of the following locations:
   North York Civic Centre, Fire Services Division, 5100 Yonge Street
   York Civic Centre, 2700 Eglinton Avenue West
   Toronto City Hall, 100 Queen Street West
   Scarborough Civic Centre, 150 Borough Drive
   Etobicoke Civic Centre, Fire Services Division, 399 The West Mall

2. Attend a Firefighter Career Information Session at the Toronto Fire Academy, 895 Eastern Avenue, Toronto, on one of the following dates:
   Saturday, September 25, 1999 — 10:00 a.m.
   Wednesday, September 29, 1999 — 7:00 p.m.
   Saturday, October 2, 1999 — 10:00 a.m.
   Tuesday, October 5, 1999 — 7:00 p.m.

3. Call the Toronto Fire Services recruitment hotline at 416-392-FIRE (416-392-3473).

4. Check our Web Site at: www.city.toronto.on.ca/index.htm

Committed to employment equity, the City of Toronto encourages applications from Aboriginal people, people with disabilities, racial minorities and women.

Vatican denounces book on Pope Pius XII

trivialized the Holocaust, despite having reliable knowledge of its true extent.

"And, worse, he was a hypocrite, because after the war he had taken undue credit for speaking out boldly against the Nazis' persecution of the Jews."

Rev. Pierre Blet, a Jesuit scholar who co-edited an 11-volume edition of Vatican wartime papers, dismissed Cornwell's book as "very confusing" and lacking documentation.

The New York-based Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights also attacked it for bad scholarship, describing the Vanity Fair article as "laced with conjecture and innuendo of the most scurrilous kind."

But Richard Heideman, president of B'nai Brith International, called Cornwell's work deeply disturbing.

"It reinforces our position that the Vatican needs to open its Holocaust-era archives to independent historians and journalists so the controversy over Pius XII's wartime actions can be dealt with fully," Heideman said.

For several years Jewish organizations have been calling for Vatican archives to be made public.

Jews have long accused Pius XII of remaining silent in the face of the Holocaust, and some of the ideas in the Vanity Fair excerpts have been presented in the past.

The 1963 play The Deputy by Rolf Hochhuth touched off the debate by painting a bitter portrait of the pope as a cynic who held scant regard for Jewish suffering.

A best-selling book published two years ago in Italy, La Parola Ebrea (The Word Jew) by Rosetta Loy, gave a detailed depiction of Pius XII as extravagantly pro-German, dating back to when he served as papal nuncio in Munich and Berlin long before he became pope.

And Pius XII is known to have been a staunch anti-Communist.

What is different with this most recent book is that Cornwell, a practising Catholic, first set out to write a defence of Pius XII and, as such, gained access to what he described as secret material from Vatican archives, including letters.

These, he wrote, were "explosive" evidence that proved Pius XII to have been blatantly anti-Semitic. He believed the Jews were responsible for their tragedy by rejecting Christ, and he also equated Jews with communists.

"He was the ideal pope for Hitler's unspeakable plan. His denial and minimization of the Holocaust were all the more scandalous in that they were uttered from a seemingly impartial moral high ground," Cornwell wrote.

The battle lines over Pius XII's wartime role have become sharper in recent years with the approach of the year 2000. The millennium year is celebrated as a Holy Year by the Roman Catholic Church, and Pope John Paul II, 79 and ailing, has indicated it as a landmark for reflection, repentance and self-examination.

Pope John Paul II has made improving Catholic-Jewish relations a priority of his papacy. He is the first pope to have visited a synagogue; he has visited Holocaust sites; and he has spoken out eloquently and frequently against anti-Semitism. He also oversaw the establishment of diplomatic relations between Israel and the Holy See.

But several recent events have raised concern among Jews.

A major Vatican document released last year repented for individual Catholic failings during the Holocaust, but absolved the Catholic Church itself from any responsibility and, in particular, staunchly defended Pius XII.

Catholic critics of Cornwell's book, such as Rev. Blet, have reiterated the Vatican's defence that Pius worked behind the scenes to help Jews.

"As far as the silence is concerned, we know clearly that a public protest against Nazism would have been a disaster not only for Catholics but above all for the Jews," Rev. Blet wrote in the Catholic newspaper Avvenire.

Last year, too, many Jews were deeply offended by the pope's canonization of Edith Stein, a Jewish convert to Catholicism who became a nun and was killed at Auschwitz. Some Jews also questioned the pope's beatification of a Croatian cardinal, Alojzije Stepinac, accused by many of having been a wartime fascist collaborator.

As the year 2000 approaches, media reports have increasingly stressed John Paul II's desire to beatify Pius XII along with two other post-war popes, John XXIII and Paul VI, as part of millennium year celebrations.

Some observers warn that the beatification issue, and competing visions of history, could become a flashpoint that might undo years of progress in Catholic-Jewish relations.

"The danger is in the buildup to beatification," said Shimon Samuels, director for international liaison at the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Some members of the church hierarchy, he said, including nationalist bishops from Eastern Europe and patriarchs in the Middle East, already view John Paul II as being too soft on Jews and Israel.

"Some feel they can use the Pius XII issue against what they see as 'Jewish power,'" Samuels said.

Cardinal Edward Cassidy, the Vatican's key liaison in Catholic-Jewish dialogue, let it be known in speeches earlier this year that the Vatican was becoming frustrated with sometimes bitter Jewish criticism of its policies – including its defence of Pius XII.

Cardinal Cassidy, who maintains excellent relations with the Jewish world, complained that "recent Jewish attempts to influence decisions concerning the internal life of the Catholic Church are strongly resented. People very dear to the Catholic faithful are condemned without proof but simply because they are not personae gratae with the Jewish community."

Already, the New York-based Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights said Cornwell's book was "an attempt to derail the beatification of this saintly man."

The furor over Cornwell's new book comes, too, at a time when Jewish – and non-Jewish – organizations, including the U.S. State Department have voiced protest over a possible papal trip to Iraq as part of a pilgrimage to biblical sites.

A new envoy, but what's in store for Israel at UN?

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Israel plans to accentuate the positive this year at the United Nations when the General Assembly's 54th session begins this week.

Commentary

The Sept. 20 opening came two weeks after Israel and the Palestinians signed the latest peace accord, following nearly a year of stalled negotiations.

Israel's incoming UN ambassador, Yehuda Lankri, who replaces Dore Gold in November, has already called for Israel to take a more open, less defensive approach to diplomacy at the world body, to reflect the progress on the peace front.

The Palestinians, too, recognize the "positive atmosphere" created by recent developments as a reason to abate hostility toward Israel at the international forum, according to their UN representative.

Moreover, the United States, under newly appointed Ambassador Richard Holbrooke, has renewed its commitment to strengthen Israel's beleaguered position at the world body.

Still, coming on the heels of what was seen as a brutally anti-Israel year in the General Assembly, there is no guarantee the UN will eliminate the negativity directed at Israel.

Tension mounted at last year's opening when Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat addressed the General Assembly for the first time since 1974.

He was expected to announce plans to declare a Palestinian state on May 4, 1999 – when the five-year interim period of the Oslo peace accords ended – but he stopped short as a result of international pressure.

The lowest point of last year's proceedings came in July, when – at the request of the majority of the General Assembly's 185 member states – a historic international conference convened in Geneva to discuss Israel's management of the "occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem."

This year, Israel is anticipating being confronted with what has become an annual list of "anti-Israel" resolutions, which will include calls for: an end to the annexation of eastern Jerusalem; Israel to withdraw to 1967 borders on the Golan Heights; granting Palestinian refugees the rights to their property in Israel; Israel's denuclearization; renewing the mandate of the committees and initiatives designed to keep the "Question of Palestine" in the forefront of UN concerns.

Israel is also preparing to defend itself against a challenge to its credentials by a bloc of more than 100 UN member states. In the past, the effort, spearheaded by Arab countries, challenged Israel itself, but last year the strategy shifted – Israel's right to represent Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza Strip was questioned.

Although the developments on the peace front have not cleared this year's UN agenda of the resolutions targeting Israel, the Palestinian observer to the UN said the current "positive atmosphere" in the peace process may lead to less confrontational language.

Dore Gold

Dr. Nasser al-Kidwa also said in an interview that a resolution voicing support for the Middle East peace process might return to its original language.

Such a resolution passed each year from 1993 until 1996. In 1997 and 1998, a similar resolution failed because Israel and the United States objected to the insertion of what they saw as inflammatory language about Israel.

Despite more positive wording, however, the essence of the annual resolutions will not change, Kidwa said, until the peace process is put into effect on the ground.

"I don't think, where we stand now would cause miracles at the UN at this stage," he said.

Statehood and full UN membership remain the Palestinians' "central goals," he said, but the Palestinians would not "take further steps in this regard" until September 2000, when a final agreement is expected to be signed.

Israel and the Palestinians launched talks regarding a final settlement last week.

Now the Israelis are calling for both parties to the peace negotiations to adhere to "a code of conduct" at the UN that would ensure the resolution of outstanding issues through bilateral negotiations, as prescribed by the peace agreements.

Last year's conference of parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention was unquestionably a triumph for the Palestinians on the question of Israeli settlements.

The Israelis, however, saw it as an example of the Palestinians' working outside the peace talks to sway international opinion.

The meeting request came out of an emergency special session of the General Assembly – the first such session to be held in 15 years – convened to discuss Israeli settlement activity since 1997, when Israel decided to start construction in the Har Choma neighborhood in eastern Jerusalem.

The conference, held on July 15 in Geneva and lasting less than an hour, was the first meeting since the inception of the Fourth Geneva Convention in 1949. The treaty covers the treatment of civilians during wartime. Israel, the United States, Canada and Australia did not attend.

A statement – it was unanimously approved – issued from the meeting, said the Fourth Geneva Convention is applicable to settlements in the West Bank.

The signatories in attendance also agreed to reconvene within six months.

Despite these shadows, Israel is planning to take a new, less defensive approach to UN business from now on.

Israel's incoming ambassador told Israel Radio in August that to build upon Israel's improved standing in the region, it should "move from a defensive approach to one of more openness towards the family of nations."

Lankri, a former Knesset member and ambassador to France, said Israel should focus on "advancing central issues and not get down in marginal ones."

Still, many Jews have taken offence at the General Assembly's decision to open its formal debate this year on Yom Kippur, the holiest day of the Jewish calendar.

Ambassador Gold, as well as leaders of some Jewish organizations, protested the UN's scheduling decision. The UN is closed on major Christian and Muslim holidays.

In a letter to the president of the American Jewish Congress, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan expressed "sincere regret for the discomfort that the decision of the General Assembly may have caused you and members of the Jewish faith around the world." He said the calendar was the assembly's responsibility.

Replying to Gold, the General Assembly's current president, Didier Opertti of Uruguay, said the date would not be changed.

Because of the conflict with Yom Kippur, U.S. President Bill Clinton has refused to deliver the opening address for the assembly's two-week general debate, as the leader of the host country would normally do. He was scheduled to speak instead on Sept. 21

Israel is counting on America's friendship during the session through the person of Holbrooke, a former assistant secretary of state, who is known for his role in negotiating the Bosnian peace accords in Dayton.

"Holbrooke represents a new U.S. commitment to ratchet up American activism on Israel's behalf in the UN, especially with respect to the anomaly that Israel is not a member of a regional group," Gold said in an interview.

Such membership is essential for eligibility to participate in important committees, including the Security Council. Israel is the only UN member state excluded from membership in the groups.

The Week in Israel

Sept 13

• A solution developed by the Hebrew University for potential Y2K problems in databases will be marketed worldwide. The solution, which university officials described as more efficient than other methods, aims at preventing potential crises in the computer operations of banks, insurance companies, government offices and other large information-processing systems during the transition to the year 2000.

Sept. 14

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak visited Ma'aleh Adumim, the largest Jewish community in the West Bank and vowed that it would remain part of the Jewish state. "Every house that you have built is part of the State of Israel forever. Period," he said. Barak's comments came came one day after the launch of final-status talks with the Palestinians.

Sept. 15

• During a visit to Haifa, the Vatican representative to Israel announced that Pope John Paul II will visit Israel and the Palestinian self-rule areas in March.

• Officials from the Foreign Ministry discussed the possibility of purchasing water from Turkey during meetings with their Turkish counterparts. Turkish President Suleyman Demirel raised the possibility of a water deal during a visit to Israel in the summer.

Sept. 16

• Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef lashed out at supporters of Aryeh Deri, the former party chair, for recent criticisms voiced against Deri's successor, Eli Yishai. (Earlier in the week, Deri returned to Israel after a two month stint raising funds in the United States.)

Sept. 17

• In an exclusive interview with Ha'aretz, former M15 agent David Shayler said that Britain had expelled Mossad agents as recently as 1995 for operating on its territory without permission. The Israeli Foreign Ministry said Shayler's report was "completely baseless."

A departure: Syria lashes out at Barak

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — In a sharp retreat from earlier expressions of optimism, Damascus has lashed out at Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Warning that Barak would bear the blame if current peace efforts founder, Damascus suggested that Israel's military superiority might not last forever.

Meanwhile, Barak was speaking more enthusiastically than ever about his hopes for peace and his admiration for Syrian President Hafez al-Assad.

Barak told the London Jewish Chronicle, in a recent interview, that he believes peace with Syria would strengthen Israel.

He went on to describe Assad as "a man of his word, a man of honor, of dignity. He is a very strong leader."

However, in the wake of the Israeli-Palestinian agreement signed earlier this month in Egypt, Damascus was in no mood to return the compliments.

Instead, Syria unleashed a barrage of criticism directed at Israel via Turki Sakr, the editor of al-Ba'ath, the government-controlled daily. Sakr is widely regarded as closely reflecting the positions of the regime.

While questioning Barak's integrity in a Sept. 9 article, Sakr made veiled threats about the fallibility of Israel's military superiority.

As a precondition to negotiations over issues of peace and security, Syria is demanding, as it has since the 1991 Madrid Peace Conference, that Israel agree to withdraw from the Golan Heights to the lines the two sides occupied at the start of the 1967 Six Day War.

Sakr challenged Barak to admit that Israel had deposited a document with the U.S. State Department in which, he said, former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin had undertaken to withdraw to the pre-Six Day War borders in the Golan Heights.

Syria wants Barak "to have the courage to recognize – not in secret, but publicly – that the document exists and that it was deposited with the State Department, thereby opening the way for a resumption of peace negotiations on the Syrian track."

Damascus, he continued, would not permit any ambiguity on this point: "For Syria, the question of land is not negotiable, and there can be no retraction of the agreement expressed in the deposited document."

According to Itamar Rabinovich, the former head of Israel's negotiating team with Syria and now the president of Tel Aviv University, Israel had asked the Syrians hypothetically about the nature of peace and security arrangements it envisaged if Israel were to agree to withdraw to the 1967 lines.

But this, said Rabinovich, did not constitute an offer or a negotiating position.

Sakr, however, insisted: "Withdrawal to the June 4, 1967, line has become a universally accepted principle and can in no way be renegotiated. Syrian land is not a matter of real estate that can be bought or sold under any circumstances."

Sakr added that if Barak "is betting on arrogance, expansionism and aggression, he should know that such gambles never paid off in the past.

"He should also know that time is not standing still for Israel's military supremacy. Or does he have an insurance policy for that supremacy?"

Analysts believe that the hostility and veiled threats reflect Damascus' frustration, now that the peace process with the Palestinians is back on track and its concern that a permanent settlement with the Palestinians will erode Syria's negotiating position, leaving it isolated, vulnerable and exposed.

'Age of impunity has ended' for war criminals

Former chief prosecutor of the United Nations (UN) war crimes tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, Arbour believes that the International Criminal Tribunals have established a model for resolving ethnic differences by "the force of law rather than the law of force."

The International Criminal Tribunals were established by the UN Security Council in 1993 for the former Yugoslavia, and in 1994 for Rwanda.

The existence of the tribunals has signaled to those who commit war crimes that "the age of impunity has ended," because international criminal law will be applied with appropriate sanctions.

The tribunals are the first time, since the Nuremburg trials after World War II, that efforts are being made through international co-operation, to bring to justice those responsible for heinous crimes during armed conflict.

Arbour fervently hopes these ad hoc tribunals will soon lead to the establishment of a permanent, independent international criminal court, with the power to charge and convict those committing genocide or crimes against humanity and other grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Convention – even if they are heads of state.

Governments, she believes, cannot be relied upon solely to protect vulnerable civilians in wartime, either because they cannot or will not do so.

Such a world court was approved in principle by 120 countries under the Rome Treaty in 1998, but has yet to be ratified and will be difficult to realize until the United States comes on board.

Arbour said that after three years of uncovering the gruesome evidence of mass murders and other acts of unspeakable violence, she has not become cynical about human nature.

"On the contrary, the experience has made me more optimistic that we can apply international legal methods to expand our arsenal of peace interventions. This is the most encouraging sign we have had since World War II. We've made more progress in five years than in the previous 50," she said.

What does disturb her is "the manipulation of history" to fan ethnic hatred by those who have something to gain. "Sheer personal interest is at the root of many of the worst crimes, not uncontrollable excesses of human nature."

Of her new job with the Supreme Court, she said what she looks forward to is having the time for "the luxury of reflection."

"I've been on the go a lot the last few years," she said.

Arbour was in her native Montreal to give the keynote address at a dinner benefiting the Fondation de la Tolérance, a project initiated by the Jewish community to help Quebec high school students understand the consequences of prejudice.

Now a non-profit organization independent of FEDERATION CJA, the foundation is co-chaired by Jewish community volunteer Monette Malewski and Raymond Bachand, head of the Quebec Federation of Labor's Solidarity Fund.

The foundation sponsors the Caravane de la Tolérance, a multimedia exhibit that has travelled to more than 50 schools around the province. It relies on government and private financing.

The dinner, attended by 800 persons, was the program's first major fundraising event since its founding in 1995. It was co-chaired by former Quebec premier Pierre Marc Johnson, and Victor Goldman who in July stepped down as federal Commissioner of Official Languages.

Arbour accepted the engagement even though it was being held at a pivotal point in her career. The next day she was to go to New York to give her final report to the UN and the following day take her place on the Supreme Court of Canada.

She praised the foundation for its "extraordinary work" in making young people aware of the dangers of prejudice, which she believes is at the root of many bloody conflicts.

"Whether in Rwanda, the former Yugoslavia or elsewhere, underlying the horrifying genocidal activities one nearly always finds a dehumanized and mechanical perception of others fed by the most primal stereotypes."

Although Arbour has lived in Ontario for many years and was a judge of that province's Court of Appeal before her appointment by the UN, she is a Quebecer (a fact underlined by Quebec Education Minister François Legault at the dinner), born in Montreal in 1947 and a graduate of the University of Montreal.

Also speaking at the dinner were Quebec Justice Minister Linda Goupil and federal Treasury Board president Lucienne Robillard.

FEDERATION CJA president, Stanley Plotnick, remarked that it was gratifying to see so many people, "regardless of our origin, religion or political beliefs, gathered here because we share the same moral vision of our society, based on justice, freedom and tolerance."

CHESS FOR CHABAD CHERNOBYL KIDS

World chess champion Gary Kasparov last week faced off against aspiring chess whizzes at Chabad's Children of Chernobyl program in Kfar Chabad, Israel. It was Kasparov's first-ever visit to the program, designed for children airlifted to Israel from Ukraine, Belarus and western Russia, regions contaminated by the Chernobyl nuclear disaster of 1986. To date, the program has evacuated 1,814 children aged six to 12, on 45 flights. Kasparov also promoted the integration of chess into Israel's school curriculum, and discussed a chess program for the Chabad school network, including 30 elementary schools and more than 180 kindergartens. Survivor's liberation was bitter-sweet sewer canal to the Vistula River and from there to make a desperate crossing to the Soviet-occupied territory.

As we reached the shore, the first two men to enter the water pulled one end of a rope to secure it across the river so that we could follow.

Within seconds, machine gun fire opened up from the bridge nearby. Flares burst overhead illuminating the night sky. By the splashing waters around us, we could see that we were the target of German machine-gun fire. When the rope stopped pulling, we knew that our friends hadn't made it. They were shot or drowning in the river.

Realizing that our plan had failed miserably, we got back to the sewer canal and returned to our bunker, soaked and exhausted.

One day, we heard unusual noises in the distance – rumbling tanks, engines of heavy trucks and people's familiar voices. Quickly we crawled out of the bunker to have a peek at what was going on. As expected, there were Soviet tanks rolling in the streets. People, however few, came out from their hiding places, hugging each other and cheering our liberators.

For me, this was a bitter-sweet liberation. After five long, agonizing years, I miraculously survived. Orphaned and bereaved, I became a free man again and a Holocaust survivor.

Soon after the liberation, Polish Jewish survivors came to register their names in an office on Targowa Street in Warsaw-Praga.

One day as I was walking down the stairs, I noticed an elderly man slowly making his way upstairs to the office. As we got closer to each other, I called out: "Bernard!"

Yes, this was Bernard Goldstein, much older and much more frail. We fell into each other's arms, crying like children. As we calmed down, he told me how he played dead on the basement floor, and how after the two German soldiers had left, he got up and walked away with the carbide lamp in his hand.

Montreal's Mount Sinai marks 90th anniversary

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It began as a 12-bed cottage in the Laurentians for convalescing tuberculosis patients in 1909.

From those humble beginnings, Mount Sinai Hospital (MSH) can claim to be the oldest Jewish health-care institution in Canada.

MSH will celebrate its 90th anniversary Oct. 6 with a gala dinner-dance at the Ritz Carlton Hotel.

The hospital is in the midst of a $7.2 million capital campaign, which is largely being used to pay off the cost of expanding the old Extendicare building that MSH moved into in 1990. This event, however, is not a fund-raiser.

From 1909 to the 1950s, MSH developed into a large, modern TB sanatorium, expanding several times on its original Préfontaine site, near Ste. Agathe. It gained a reputation for its treatment of the disease, as well as research, in an era when often the most doctors could recommend was fresh air and rest.

The famous Dr. Norman Bethune, a leading thoracic surgeon, was once an attending physician at MSH.

With the advent of better detection methods and antibiotic therapy, the incidence of TB dramatically decreased. MSH became an intermediate-care facility specializing in the treatment and rehabilitation of patients with different types of respiratory diseases, such as emphysema, bronchitis, and asthma.

In its later years, some of its beds were devoted to long-term care of the chronically ill.

One of the reasons MSH moved to Côte St. Luc was to better provide such care within the Jewish community. It insisted, though, that it not lose its specialization in respiratory illness, and since that time has, in fact, expanded its services, especially at the out-patient level.

"We have a definite niche in the health-care system of Montreal," said MSH centre president, Elliot Bier, noting that respiratory illness continues to be the third leading cause of death in Canada.

MSH has 107 beds – 57 long-term and 50 short-term, divided between 35 for those with chest diseases needing intermediate care and 15 for palliative care. The average stay in a short-term bed is 21 days. A McGill University teaching hospital, MSH also conducts research into respiratory illness.

Funding comes from both government and private sources, and the population MSH serves come from many religious and cultural backgrounds.

"Our goal is to return the patient to a productive life," Bier said.

The nine weekly clinics are attended both by ex-patients requiring followup, as well as by those who were treated at other hospitals. About 600 persons are seen each year at these clinics. The MSH is now expanding its rehabilitation services for out-patients.

A recent addition was a sleep apnoea lab, where sufferers may sleep overnight at the hospital while their breathing patterns are monitored.

Soon to be launched is an asthma clinic for adults.

MSH also runs programs in the community aimed at disease prevention – these include teaching school children about the hazards of smoking, and stop-smoking groups for adults.

The theme of the gala dinner is Celebration of Life.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

I recently saw a show on TV aimed at teaching parents how to feed children in a healthy way. Many of this show's suggestions were good, such as offering variety and not limiting your child's exposure to food to only the foods that you like.

However, there was one recommendation I strongly disagreed with: insisting that children eat three bites of everything on the table before they can have dessert. As I've written in the past, this behavior quickly labels food. The main course becomes the punishment, the dessert, the reward.

These children grow up wanting only rewards, not punishments, and therefore they end up choosing sweets over healthful foods. All foods have nutritional value and merit. If you're going to serve or offer dessert, don't feature it as the reward.

Home care cutbacks slammed

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The reduction of home care to two hours a week instead of four has aggravated a serious situation, said Lillian Morgenthau, president of Canada's Association for the Fifty-Plus (CARP).

"We are getting lots of letters and lots of flak," she said of the provincial government's decision to reduce home care.

"It's like being asked to get along on one meal a day instead of three."

Morgenthau said the situation is just as serious for the caregivers as it is for the people who need the home care.

"The caregivers are being burned out. It's ridiculous to ask a husband of 80 to look after his wife. He is not a nurse, he hasn't been trained. And they are doing all this for free."

CARP recently sponsored a forum on home care and sent 22 recommendations to the federal government including one on training for caregivers.

CARP expects action on the proposals soon, Morgenthau said.

"Health care in Ontario is in a shambles," according to a report entitled When Seniors Don't Matter, a joint project of the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens' Organizations, the Ontario Council of Hospital Unions/CUPE, Service Employees International Unions, the Older Women's Network and Canadian Pensioners Concerned.

"The cutbacks have resulted in an environment of anxiety, where people are afraid of becoming ill and not getting the care they need in time," the report said.

The five organizations set up a hotline asking for accounts of how people are suffering. Among the calls the hotline received was one reporting a patient lying on an emergency stretcher for three days because no beds were available. Another described a patient being discharged from hospital four hours after suffering a stroke.

There were also calls about patients lying in their own excrement, and of struggling seniors trying to provide their own in-home care for a spouse because no help from overworked and understaffed health care workers was available.

Health care "is a mere shadow of what it once was due to the cuts inflicted by the current government," the report said.

Here's the truth: Jakob the Liar is downright drab

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jakob the Liar, the latest Holocaust film from Hollywood, is a major disappointment.

Premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival last week, and currently playing at the Cineplex Odeon chain, it has neither the visceral power of Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List nor the zany wit of Roberto Benigni's Life is Beautiful (which itself was overrated).

The trouble with Peter Kassovitz's two-hour film, shot in Poland and Hungary, is that it is emotionally flat and, occasionally, downright drab.

You are not moved, much less stirred, by Jakob the Liar, which is based on Jurek Becker's novel of the same name. It flickers on the wide screen inertly, a beached whale of a movie.

Worst of all, its upbeat message is shallow and artificial. In this respect, the last scene will be particularly offensive, especially to those who are even remotely familiar with the unrelieved and unmitigated horror of the Holocaust.

Robin Williams is largely out of his depth

There was indeed a sacred space for dark humor during the Holocaust. In disastrous times, Jews have historically leaned on irony for a measure of comfort. And while there are at least two such distinct moments in Jakob the Liar (mordant jokes about Hitler and the travails of the chosen people), they are the exceptions rather than the rule.

Not even Robin Williams, who plays the lead role, can save it from itself. Williams, whose madcap antics have enlivened films like Good Morning Vietnam and The Birdcage, is largely out of his depth in this terrain. Try as he might, he sinks with the deadweight that is Jakob the Liar.

It is set in the winter of 1944, in a ghetto starved for news. As Jakob the Liar opens, Jakob Heym (Williams), a former pancake vendor whose wife was murdered by the Germans, scurries after a newspaper sheet flying in the wind. He desperately wants to devour what information it may contain.

But in his haste to catch the elusive page, he supposedly breaks the curfew and is sent to the German commandant's office for punishment. As he waits in his office, he overhears a forbidden radio bulletin signalling a Soviet military success against German forces in the vicinity.

Robin Williams in Jakob the Liar.

Ordered to return home, Jakob meets Lina Kronstein (Hannah Gordon-Taylor), a 10-year-old girl who has escaped from a train carrying her parents to a concentration camp. Regarding Lina as a symbol of precious youth and of a better future, he shelters her in his house.

Meanwhile, at the freight yard where he unloads cement bags from boxcars, Jakob tells Mischa (Liev Schreiber), a fellow Jew ready to take foolish risks in order to survive, that the Soviet army will soon liberate the ghetto. How does he know? "I have a radio," Jakob lies, realizing that possession of a radio by a Jew is punishable by death.

The rumor spreads that Jakob has a radio. Reluctantly, Jakob fabricates news of Germans defeats, thereby feeding the ghetto with hope that liberation is near. He even goes as far as to act out a BBC broadcast for Lina's benefit. As a result of his efforts, the suicide rate drops and spirits lift.

When the Gestapo learns that Jakob has a radio, he is arrested and tortured. The Germans promise to release him if he tells the ghetto inhabitants that he never had a radio and that, in effect, resistance is pointless. The offer is tempting.

The basic elements of Becker's uplifting fable are in place, but Kossovitz can't pump passion into the story. In his hands, Jakob the Liar is limp and bereft of tension, lacking the energy, momentum and inspirational mood of a first-class film.

It seems like such a waste.

Williams, his Polish accent somewhat credible, his face a mask of resignation, struggles to deliver a knockout performance, but he cannot because he is hobbled by a mediocre script.

Schreiber, Alan Arkin, Armin Mueller-Stahl and Taylor-Gordon acquit themselves honorably, but they, too, are unable to escape from the cinematic morass that is Jakob the Liar.

Ashkenaz for the whole family

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Babes in arms, kids in strollers, and preschoolers were among those at the recent Ashkenaz festival who were entranced by two plays based on Yiddish folk tales.

The younger set (and their parents) took over, when, for the first time Ashkenaz: a Festival of New Yiddish Culture paid tribute to the growing popularity of theatre geared to children.

It was standing room only for a total of eight performances of the two plays – The Crowded House and Shrewd Todie and Lizer the Miser. The Crowded House (the author is unknown) was directed and performed by Naomi Kates. Shrewd Todie and Lizer the Miser, which is based on a short story by Isaac Bashevis Singer, was directed by Lisa Rothman.

In The Crowded House, a puppet show, the simple reasoning of an unsophisticated rabbi wins the day. Human credulity and greed are the downfall of Lizer the Miser in Singer's story, which was performed for the first time ever.

"I was at Ashkenaz with my bubbie two years ago and was struck by the absence of children's theatre," said Rothman, a well-known actor in her own right.

Naomi Kates

"I grew up with Singer's story, it was read to me several times," she said.

The play tells the story of how the hero, Todie, a failure up to this point, gets Lizer the Miser to hand over his candlesticks by convincing him that the candlesticks will beget silver teaspoons.

Rothman directed a cast of 12 which included, Stephen Near as Todie, Ben Hur as Lizer, Katherine Warren as the narrator and Rachel Sheinen as the Fiddler.

The puppets, in The Crowded House, designed and built by Kates in her home studio in Riverdale, delighted the children, especially those puppets of the chickens, rooster, horse and cow.

In the story a man goes to a rabbi for advice on what to do about his cramped living quarters. The rabbi recommends that the animals be put in the man's house. He later discovers how roomy his home is, once, upon the rabbi's advice, the animals are evicted.

"I think today, people are expecting the voices of puppets to be visible," said Kates, who played the part of the all-knowing rabbi.

A visual artist, Kates painted signs and was an assistant builder for the Ashkenaz parade two years ago.

Her cast included her daughter, Roshaya Kates-Rodness, David Hermolin and Michael Constables.

Rothman hopes to take the Singer play on tour to the Jewish Day Schools in Toronto as she devotes a greater part of her time to children's theatre.

"It's at the heart of my future in theatre," she said. She has just taken a position as an educational services assistant with Young Peoples Theatre.

In the more traditional world of theatre, her next assignment is as assistant director of Patience, a play by Jason Sherman, which will be opening the Canadian Stage's program at the Berkeley Street Theatre in 2000.

Quashing myths about Israel

Seasoned travel writers visit Israel for the first time

By BRAM EISENTHAL
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — I knew some opinions about Israel were going to change dramatically.

On the El Al flight, Heather Grace, my associate in the Quebec chapter of the Travel Media Association of Canada (TMAC), was concerned about what she would find there. It was her first visit.

"My mother told me to bring my personal alarm," Grace said. "My boyfriend said I shouldn't drink the water and not to eat dairy products."

I couldn't help but chuckle. Grace's concerns represented only the tip of the iceberg of misconceptions.

We were part of a group of 20 seasoned travel writers being sent to Israel by TMAC, courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office. The project was a first for the Israeli body. For most writers, the majority non-Jews, it was their first Israel experience. It was my seventh time and I proudly felt as if I was about to show them my homeland.

The plan was to split us up into four groups of five writers, with each heading into differing cultural, religious or historic territory: food and wine, religious and archeological, health and spa, and the tour I chose, soft adventure.

I had already seen Israel from many different angles, and this was an opportunity to do exciting new things my 42-year-old bones could still tolerate, like swimming with dolphins in the Red Sea, jeep riding through the desert, getting seriously acquainted with a camel and climbing Masada, which was new for me as a 40-something individual.

We met our counterparts in Jerusalem, spent Shabbat there together, and then moved into our groups. We reunited for our final day in Tel Aviv, were we shared our stories.

After participating in the religious and archeological tour, Grace was literally awe-struck – and no longer feared dairy products, I'm happy to report, after partaking in many Israeli breakfasts.

"I thought that people would be much more aggressive, especially the men," she said. "I also knew it would be rich in history, but I wasn't prepared for how rich in culture Israel is and how quickly I got a taste of this.

"I was also not excluded from things because I was a tourist and a non-Jew. Even the language barriers didn't interfere with my enjoyment of the trip. Meeting the people and taking their pictures, was, for me, the highlight."

One special memory for Grace was an experience in the Galilee, where they were dining at a local restaurant.

"The sun was setting and it was so beautiful, I started crying. I couldn't believe I was there. Then I looked up and saw this beautiful Jewish bride with a halo of flowers. They put up the canopy, the rabbi came and the couple was married in Hebrew. It was so beautiful."

Quebec's Sylvie Rivard was my soft adventure tour partner and she, too, was moved.

"I was raised a devout Catholic, living right near our church. I didn't read much about politics or world conflicts before, so I didn't know much about Israel. I expected to feel tension, especially in Jerusalem, but I didn't sense any," Rivard said.

"Jerusalem was incredible, a treasure in a box, where you find jewels from the world's great religions. You walk where history has been made and I felt a lot of respect for that city."

As for the soft adventure on her trip, Rivard "loved crossing the desert, discovering its landscapes and exploring all the way south from Jerusalem. I loved climbing Masada as the sun came up," she says.

"It was a total experience for me. That is barely the limit for soft adventure, as you have to be fit to do it. I also enjoyed 'snuba' diving in the Red Sea and recommend this new form of diving for anyone. In a land that's primarily seen as religious, there's plenty to do here for adventurers of all ages."

Dave Stephens and Susan Randles, a travel writing couple, hail from Nova Scotia. Randles wound up on the Religion and Archaeology portion and was positively beaming with delight during our farewell dinner. Stephens experienced Food and Wine.

"I expected much more military personnel than we actually saw," Stephens said. "All in all, I was pleasantly surprised by how modern and developed Israel is.

"Our food experience was amazing. With Dr. Shaul Eger, we swallowed mouthfuls of olive oil from wine glasses at a tasting session at the Radisson hotel in Tiberias. We smelled it, drank it and it was one of the most unusual things I've ever done," admitted the wine columnist and connoisseur.

"Then, at Ein Kamonim, we experienced goat milk, goat cheese and ice cream made from goat milk, at the restaurant of a man with 83 goats, Amiram Ovrutski.... he knows each of them by name! I'd come back at the drop of a kipa," he said with a somewhat goatish grin.

So would any of us, I'd bet. Especially Heather Grace, who has probably already convinced her mother, boyfriend and best friend to join her the next time around.

Hitler doc examines the depths to which humans can sink

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If it is true that one person can affect the course of history, Adolf Hitler surely personifies this thesis.

Drawing on Hitler's rabid nationalistic obsessions, master-race ideology and aggressive policies, Germany turned ferociously on its Jewish citizens, launched World War II and conceived and implemented the Holocaust.

The Nazis: A Warning from History, a stellar BBC series to be broadcast on TVOntario starting Sept. 27 at 10 p.m., shows how Hitler came to power, how he related to Jews, and how, in a paroxysm of unsurpassed hatred, he murdered them in an unprecedented program of industrial extermination.

Based on eyewitness interviews and on archival footage never seen before, The Nazis is a chilling, sobering documentary well worth allotting time for.

Hitler ultimately triumphed because conditions were right. Germany's defeat in World War I triggered the myth that it had been "stabbed in the back" by an unholy alliance of Jews and Marxists.

The humiliating Versailles Treaty, as well as the failed Marxist republic in Munich spearheaded by Jewish Germans, pandered to the anti-Semitic belief that Jews were in the forefront of a world-wide conspiracy to weaken Germany.

At one juncture, the Nazi Party seemed like a spent force, having fared very badly in the 1928 elections. But they rebounded. Several factors facilitated Hitler's rise to power – the Depression, the polarization of Nazi politics, the disenchantment with Weimar democracy, and the yearning for a "strong man" to establish order and discipline.

In the July 1932 election, the Nazis won 37 percent of the vote, making them the largest party in the Reichstag. In the election four months later, their share of the vote dropped by five points.

Conservative Germans generally regarded Hitler with contempt, but urged President Paul von Hindenburg to appoint him chancellor after the 1932 elections. They were convinced that they could control Hitler. What a monumental miscalculation!

Hindenburg, after appointing him, confided to a friend that Hitler would push Germany into "the abyss."

Twelve weeks after taking his oath of office, Hitler initiated a one-day boycott of Jewish shops. This was followed by a systematic campaign to disenfranchise Jews.

Hitler's anti-Semitic legislation enjoyed popular support. There was a feeling in the country that Jews had "gone too far" and had to be "driven back," observes an elderly German man, referring to the domination of certain professions by Jews.

Clearly, despite the civic admvances the Jews had made since the 19th century, they were widely regarded as foreigners by a disturbing number of Germans.

Kristallnacht, in 1938, did not dim Hitler's popularity. Through a combination of public works projects and rearnament, Germany had grown somewhat prosperous, a fact which desensitized Germans.

As late as 1940, Hitler had no single plan to exterminate Jews en masse. Indeed, he accentuated emigration as a means by which to solve the so-called "Jewish problem."

But with Germany's 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union, a country whose Jewish population was vast, a new situation arose.

Special German mobile killing squads were sent into action to decimate Jews, often with the assistance of local collaborators. "You just pull the trigger, he falls, and that's it," says a Lithuanian war criminal, coldly describing his murder of Jewish civilians.

In Germany, meanwhile, the government began deporting Jews to concentration camps and ghettos in eastern Europe. Few Germans protested. "You didn't pay much attention," muses a German man who witnessed one such deportation from his window.

Nevertheless, we're told, the Nazis tried to conceal the Final Solution, fearing it might precipitate opposition. Always careful, Nazi bureaucrats used a variety of euphemisms to disguise the real nature of the Holocaust.

There were Germans who detested Hitler, as evidenced by the July 1944 assassination attempt on his life. But many Germans continued to support him, and the blatantly racist state he had created, to the bitter end. And, it should be noted, 400,000 foreigners joined the Waffen SS.

Hitler, finally, was a disaster for Jews and Germans alike. The personification of evil, he will always remind us of the depths to which human beings can sink in the service of a cause. That's the most powerful – and depressing – message conveyed by The Nazis.

The Dybbuk tops writer's list of best Jewish films

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

With the recent growth of interest in Jewish films, I began thinking of some of the truly outstanding Jewish films of the past.

The American Film Institute recently released a list of this century's top 100 films. I'm not about to put together a list of 100 top Jewish films, but I certainly can put together a list of my top 20 Jewish films of the century.

1. The Dybbuk (1937) is a classic in Jewish filmmaking. Produced in Poland just before the War, this Yiddish film has survived the test of time. Based on Anski's great Yiddish play, this film was restored by the National Centre for Jewish Film in the United States.

2. Schindler's List (1993) is a classic of the modern cinema and one of the truly great films about the Holocaust. Steven Spielberg crafted a superb work that encompasses many elements of the Holocaust and brings them together on the screen in a way everyone can understand.

3. Shoah (1985) is a massive documentary that has become a standard for all other Holocaust documentaries. At more than nine hours, the film does become somewhat of a marathon, but Claude Lansmann lets the interviewees tell their stories in a way that keeps the viewers interested and involved.

4. To Be Or Not To Be (1942) is a masterpiece of black comedy. It is innovative, while possessing a powerful anti-Nazi message and a strong plea for Jewish survival. Directed by Ernst Lubitsch and featuring Jack Benny and Carole Lombard, the story is about a group of Polish actors caught up in the Nazi occupation and their attempts to assist the underground.

5. Yidl Mitn Fidl (1936) is one of the most memorable films made by Molly Picon. This Yiddish tale of a girl dressing in men's clothing and joining a klezmer band is very contemporary in many ways – a forerunner of such modern feminist films as Yentl, The Way We Were, and many others.

6. The Chosen (1981) explores the relationship between two Jewish teenagers. It provides interesting insights into Judaism and how the religion has been influenced by modern society. Features a strong performance by Rod Steiger.

7. The Jazz Singer (1927) was the first "talkie," despite the fact that it contains very little dialogue and only a few songs. It revolutionized filmmaking and was one of the last films in many years to unashamedly present a Jewish family on the screen.

8. The Pawnbroker (1965) was a breakthrough in Holocaust films. Before this film, the Holocaust topic was almost taboo in Hollywood. This film about a survivor tortured by his memories was therefore unique, and Rod Steiger's performance was exemplary.

9. Europa Europa (1991) is a powerful story about a Jewish boy who survives the Holocaust by pretending to be German. He is forced to attend a school run by the Hitler Jugend and then serves in a German army unit. The film created some controversy when Germany refused to nominate it for an Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film although it was a remarkable piece of filmmaking.

10. Cabaret (1972) is an innovative musical, set in Berlin during the 1930s. We see German society deteriorating during the early years of the Hitler regime, as well as the growing pervasiveness of the Nazi race laws. Director and choreographer, Bob Fosse, took a Broadway show, reshaped it, and ended up with an entirely new and powerful production. Joel Grey and Liza Minnelli hit career highs with this film.

11. Fiddler On The Roof (1971) was based on the successful Broadway show, which itself was based on the stories of Sholem Aleichem. The creators of this film were able to remain true to the Yiddish culture from which it comes.

12. Goodbye Columbus (1969) looks at a successful Jewish family and their spoiled daughters from the viewpoint of a poor working-class librarian from the Bronx. The only well-adjusted character in the film is the girl's father. A wonderful portrayal by all.

13. Diary Of Anne Frank (1959) is based on the famous diary written by a Jewish girl while in hiding in an attic in Amsterdam during the Nazi occupation of Holland. Although the film producers emphasized the universal elements of the book, it was one of the first big studio pictures to deal with the Holocaust.

14. Marjorie Morningstar (1958) is one of the first films about a Jewish family where the female character carries most of the plot and in which the characters are clearly Jewish. Gene Kelly, who stars in the film, always maintained that the film would have been better served if the lead characters had been played by Jewish actors.

15. The Great Dictator (1940) saw a lot of resistance by Hollywood when it was made. Fortunately, Charlie Chaplin was able to finance this film on his own and it still remains one of the great anti-racist films of all time.

16. Funny Girl (1968) is another female driven film, this time about the very Jewish Fannie Brice and her road to success on Broadway. Barbara Streisand gives a magnificent performance in her first film role.

17. Exodus (1960) is the epic story of the creation of Israel. Based on the best-selling novel by Leon Uris, this film takes the most important incidents of the book and puts them on the screen.

18. Gentleman's Agreement (1947) was one of the first films to tackle the problem of anti-Semitism. Gregory Peck plays a magazine writer who decides to research a story about prejudice by pretending to be Jewish.

19. Hester Street (1974) is an interesting attempt to recreate the world of the lower east side of New York City during the great wave of Jewish immigration at the end of the 19th century and into the early 20th century. It provides some insights into a world that no longer exists and that few of us remember now.

20. Green Fields (Grine Felde) (1937) is a classic romance of the Yiddish cinema about a young scholar leaving the yeshiva in search of the reality of the outside world.

Young athletes join JCC Maccabi Games

By NEIL BECKER

TORONTO — During the week of Aug. 17 to 22, young Jewish athletes from all over the world participated in the annual JCC Maccabi Games in Rochester, N.Y.

The games, which are the biggest organized program for Jewish teens in the world, had participants from Canada, the United States, Australia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Great Britain, Holland, Israel, Lithuania, Mexico, Russia and Venezuela come together to participate head to head in a friendly competition involving various Olympic sports.

Toronto claimed 73 medals, including a silver medal in boys basketball, silver in golf, bronze in girls softball, bronze in doubles tennis, gold/bronze in volleyball, 12 medals in track and 30 medals in the pool.

Grant Smith, who organized and helped make the experience a positive one for the Toronto participants, stressed that just as important as the events themselves was to help the participants realize the importance of Judaism.

"It's an opportunity for them to explore their heritage. In the evening there are social programs on Judaism. One year, there was a girl from London, Ont., who was in awe of seeing so many Jewish boys. In London, there is not a big Jewish population," Smith said.

The games had an underlying theme of convut, which means displaying respect for the other athletes, Smith said.

He said a time was included for the Toronto athletes to help hungry people in Rochester.

"Tuesday was a day of caring, when the Toronto athletes brought 500 pounds of canned food to give to the food drive in Rochester. There was also a march to fight against hunger, from one synagogue to another."

In total, the Maccabi Games, which began in 1988, attracted 94 participants from Toronto. According to Smith, not just anyone can sign up and expect to be on a team. There are extensive tryouts for every sport, with the best performers given a spot on the roster.

"In basketball, we have 40 to 50 kids trying out for 10 spots. For track and field and swimming, they must submit times. The success we have in the games makes the kids want to come back even more," Smith said.

These Olympics were a proud moment for the young adults representing Toronto, as they entered Blue Cross Arena on the first day to a loud ovation from friends and family.

"A lot of friends and family came down to Rochester, which made it special for the kids. We came in through the front wearing Toronto shirts. The athletes who have been in the program for a while got to carry the flag and the Toronto sign into the gymnasium," Smith said.

The underlying idea of the games is to get the kids involved in a non-competitive manner. The plan is not to showcase one team as being the best.

One goal of the games that has become a reality over the years is the creation of lasting friendships between youngsters from different parts of the world.

"Kids have made friends from all over the States and are writing each other," Smith said.

These regional games are held every year. Every fourth year the Mcubbey games are held, which incorporate junior programs held in Israel.

Next summer, the games will be held in either Cincinnati or Staten Island. Young Jewish Toronto athletes will be attempting not only to defend their 73 medal titles, but also to foster new lasting friendships and to learn all about sportsmanship and what it means to be Jewish.

Special thanks go to Incredible Clothing for providing the uniforms for the Toronto athletes.

A young batter anticipates the arrival of the pitch.

Ted Badner, centre, middle, coach of the Maccabi basketball team is seen here with a group of Maccabi alumni.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

בסקס צנוע ללא הספדים

בחלוויתו של חנוך לוין, ביום חמישי, ז' באלול, תשנ"ט, 19 באוגוסט 1999, לא נישאו הספדים. כפי שביקש בצוואתו, גם לא חיו נאומים. הוא גם לא אהב בחייו את התואר שהוצמד לו כגדול המחזאים הישראלים.

חנוך לוין לא למד תיאטרון; הוא למד ספרות עברית ופילוסופיה אך לא ניגש לבחינות ולא קיבל תואר. הוא כתב 50 מחזות שאת רובם ביים. הוא לא זכה בפרס ישראל (כנראה מאותן סיבות שישעיהו ליבוביץ' לא זכה) אך לפני שנתיים קיבל פרס מיוחד על מפעל חייו. הוא היה איש צנוע, ביישן שסירב להתראיין.

בשנים האחרונות הרבה לוין לעסוק בנושא המוות. "למה החיים ניתנים לאדם רק פעם אחת וחולפים ללא תועלת" כתב במחזה האחרון שהועלה על הבמה, "אשכבה". עד לרגעיו האחרונים, בעודו מאושפז בבית החולים והמחלה כבר התפשטה בכל גופו, עסק בחזרות למחזהו האחרון "חבבניים".

ידענו כולנו שחנוך לוין מאוד חולה אך לא רצינו להאמין שימיו ספורים. הידיעה על מותו הכתה את אנשי התרבות הישראלית בהלם. קהל רב של סופרים, מוסיקאים, אנשי אקדמיה, שרי ממשלה, במאים ושחקנים ליוו את חנוך לוין בדרכו האחרונה.

בצוואתו האישית ביקש המחזאי, הסופר והמשורר קבורה צנועה, בלי מצלמות ובלי להציב את ארונו על הבמה. לבקשתו הוא נקבר ליד חוריו בבית העלמין קרית שאול.

FOR LESS

3 large eggs	3/4 tsp almond extract	1 tsp ground cinnamon
1 cup sugar	3 cups flour	3/4 tsp baking soda
1 tsp vanilla extract	1/2 cup chopped toasted almonds	1/4 tsp salt

Preheat oven to 350°F. Grease 18x12x1" baking sheet. Beat first 4 ingredients until blended. Mix flour, almonds, cinnamon, baking soda and salt in medium bowl. Gradually add to egg mixture, beating until dough is soft.

Turn dough out onto floured surface and gather together. Roll between palms and work surface into 16" long log. Transfer to prepared sheet. Flatten log to 1" thickness. Bake until light brown and cracked on top, about 30 minutes. Transfer sheet to rack; cool 10 minutes. Reduce oven to 325°F.

Transfer warm log to work surface. Using serrated knife, cut on sharp diagonal into 1/4" slices. Arrange sideways on baking sheets. Bake 10 minutes per side. Transfer to racks and cool (will harden while cooling). Yield: 36. (Can be made ahead. Store airtight up to 1 week.)

Correction to Challah-Cranberry Casserole (Sept. 16th issue): Prior to pouring maple syrup and cranberries over casserole - BAKE CASSEROLE AT 350°F FOR 1-1/4 HRS.

About Food

By NORENE GILLETZ

Sukkot celebrates the final gathering of the harvest before the winter. Meals are served in the Sukkah, an outdoor structure with a leafy roof partly open to the sky. The sukkah symbolizes the temporary shelters in which our ancestors lived during their 40 years in the desert.

The agricultural theme is celebrated by eating a variety of fruits and vegetables. Stuffed vegetables (cabbage, eggplant, zucchini, peppers) are served for Sukkot. Kreplach and kugels, challah and strudels – these are a few of my favorite things!

Thanks to Esther Schwartz, Toronto kosher food expert, for sharing this delicious recipe which is perfect for Sukkot!

SWEET & SOUR HOLISHKES

Jews all over the world make stuffed cabbage leaves, although the names and recipes vary. They are galuptze from Russia, holishkes from eastern Europe, sarmali from Romania and dolmas from Armenia.

Cabbage:
1 loose head cabbage (5 lb.)

Stuffing:
2 lb. lean ground chuck
1 medium onion
1 garlic clove, pressed
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/2 cup stock or water
2 tsp. prepared mustard
1/4 cup ketchup
1 tsp. HP sauce
1/2 cup long grain rice (raw)

Sauce:
1 (28 oz.) can tomatoes
2 (11 oz.) cans tomato mushroom sauce
1/2 cup Sugar Twin (brown sugar replacement) juice of one lemon (1/4 cup)

Place cabbage in a plastic bag in freezer at least 2 days in advance. Remove from freezer the night before you intend to make cabbage rolls. Remove from bag and place in colander in sink. In the morning, core cabbage. Leaves will separate easily. Dry with paper towels.

Combine all stuffing ingredients; mix well. Place a heaping tablespoon of mixture near stem end of each leaf. Fold stem end over filling, then fold in the sides; roll up firmly.

Combine sauce ingredients. Shred the core and any leftover cabbage. In a Dutch oven, place a layer of cabbage, a layer of cabbage rolls (seam-side-down), tightly packed, then a layer of sauce. Repeat until all is used. Simmer gently for 2 hours on top of stove tightly covered.

Preheat oven to 275. Sprinkle with paprika. Place in oven uncovered. Bake 2 hours. Freezes well. Makes 30.

One cabbage roll is 1 protein choice, 1/2 starchy choice, 8 grams carbohydrate, 8 grams protein, 3 grams fat. 91 calories.

Your gift lifts lives

Not that long ago, our community's challenged children faced overwhelming obstacles to Jewish education. Today, your UJA Federation gift provides special help for over 1,000 wonderful kids who have difficulty keeping up in the mainstream Jewish school system. Children with Down Syndrome or Cerebral Palsy who receive loving care at the Zareinu Education Centre. Children with learning disabilities, whose talents are nurtured by She'arim Hebrew Day School's attentive teachers. And children with learning problems at other day schools who receive extra assistance from sensitive Jewish Vocational Service specialists. Together, through your support for UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 , we're making Jewish life accessible to children who would otherwise be left behind.

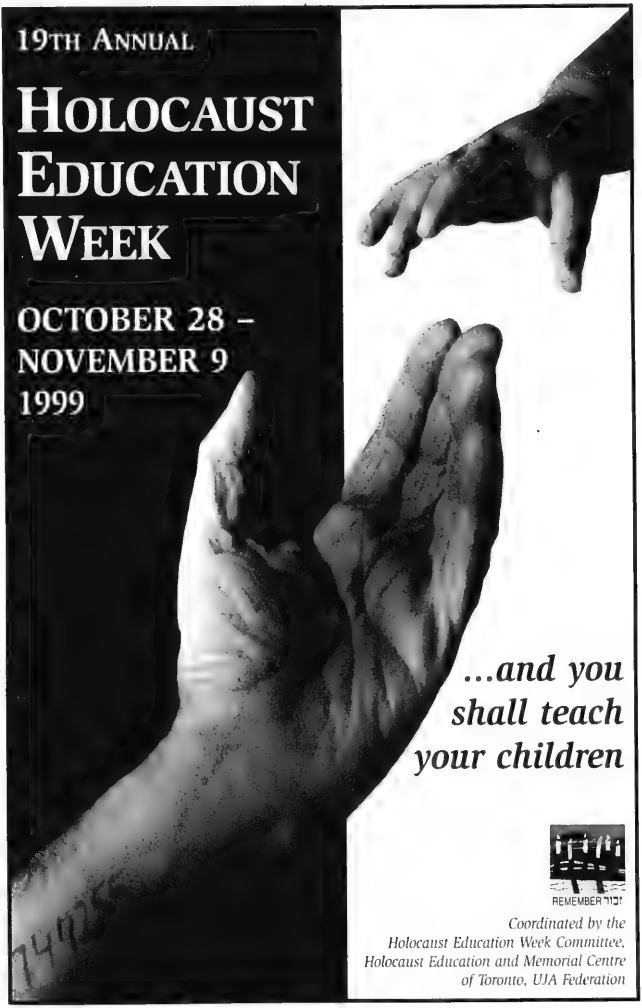
19TH ANNUAL

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

OCTOBER 28 – NOVEMBER 9 1999



...and you shall teach your children

REMEMBER זכור

Coordinated by the Holocaust Education Week Committee, Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation

...In Support of HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

"On behalf of the Town of Markham, I am honoured to give our support for Holocaust Education Week. The recent crisis in Kosovo shows us that our struggle to eliminate racial and religious hatred is far from over. In memory of all those who perished in the Holocaust, it is our duty to curb prejudice and racism by continuing to educate our children and raise public awareness to develop a deeper understanding of our responsibility for the future."

W. DONALD COUSENS
Mayor, Town of Markham

"Millions of individuals suffered unimaginable circumstances during the Holocaust, making it one of the most significant and tragic events of this century. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto plays an important role in raising public awareness and understanding about the horrors of the Holocaust. As we prepare for a new millennium, it remains critical for us to remember the atrocities that were committed and to ensure that they never happen again."

HAZEL McCALLION
Mayor, City of Mississauga

"The horrors of the Holocaust must never be repeated, and so, on behalf of the members of Council, I am proud and honoured to support UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its ongoing initiative to raise awareness through Holocaust Education Week."

WILLIAM F. BELL
Mayor, The Town of Richmond Hill

"Through photographs, newsreels, and first person accounts, the world has learned of the destruction that took the lives of 6 million Jewish men, women and children. On behalf of the members of Council, I applaud UJA Federation of Greater Toronto on its continuing efforts to ensure that the Holocaust is never forgotten."

LORNA D. JACKSON
Mayor, City of Vaughan

PROCLAMATION

Holocaust Education Week

October 28 - November 9, 1999

WHEREAS: It is important to honour the memory of the millions of men, women and children who perished during the Holocaust. To avoid a repetition of history it is essential that younger generations learn the lessons of the past and develop a deeper understanding of their responsibility for the future; and

WHEREAS: the unimaginable horrors of the past must never be repeated, and only through remembrance, education and understanding of the Holocaust can public awareness can be heightened and anti-semitism, racism and prejudice eliminated.

NOW, THEREFORE: I, Mel Lastman, Mayor of the City of Toronto, on behalf of Toronto City Council and the more than 2.3 million people do hereby proclaim October 28 - November 9, 1999 "Holocaust Education Week" and salute the Holocaust Education & Memorial Centre of Toronto and the United Jewish Appeal for raising public awareness of this horrendous time in history and for their continuing efforts in curbing racism and prejudice.

Mel Lastman

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO
No one gift changes more lives

Each year, our community holds Holocaust Education Week. Thousands of people from diverse religious and national origins come and learn together about the horror that was the Holocaust.

The Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of UJA Federation, and specifically, the Holocaust Education Week Committee, are dedicated to teaching the facts and lessons of the Shoah.

Too often, contemporary events show us that we still have much work to do. Our efforts must continue in the face of continuing racial and ethnic hatred and violence.

On behalf of the Directors of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, I want to extend our appreciation to the many organizations, religious institutions, schools, universities and bookstores for participating in what has become the most ambitious and comprehensive Holocaust education and remembrance program in the world.

Best wishes for a successful Holocaust Education Week.

Yours sincerely,

As all the digits change on the new millennial calendar and the events of the past century recede in memory, remembering what happened from 1933 to 1945 becomes as problematic as remembering what happened during the same years of the preceding century. Such remembering does not come naturally or easily. Someone has to work at it.

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto is committed to this task. Each year, this committee coordinates the participation of Christian churches in Holocaust Education Week. The number of churches has grown each year - to 36 this year - and we are pleased that so many have made this an annual event on their calendar.

This participation signals a growing recognition that the Holocaust is an event not just in Jewish history. Not only is it a watershed event in universal history, but in the history of the Christian Church as well. We remember, we all must remember, because the Holocaust teaches us something we need to know about our past and ourselves.

The Rev. Glen Nelson

Robert Engel

So we are grateful to UJA Federation's Holocaust Education Week Committee for so graciously incorporating these church programs in its extensive schedule of activities, and promoting them through this brochure. We look forward to seeing you at one or more of them.

CHAIRMAN'S MESSAGE

It is my pleasure to welcome you to our 19th Annual Holocaust Education Week.

From modest beginnings, this program has grown almost unimaginably in both scope and depth: over 110 programs; 36 participating churches; displays in 22 bookstores; renowned international and local speakers, academics and performers; and, official recognition from the City of Toronto and GTA municipalities.

The mandate of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto is to promote Holocaust education and remembrance. Holocaust Education Week is our largest and highest profile project, but we are engaged in a number of other important activities. Our Centre is attended by over 25,000 visitors annually. Our Director of Education provides teacher support and curriculum development. Due to increased demand and need, we have finalized an expansion of our activities and space into a new Holocaust Resource Centre, to be located in The Albert and Tammy Latner Jewish Public Library, adjacent to our present space.

It is only through remembrance and education that we can ensure the memory of those lost and learn the lessons of the Holocaust. Holocaust denial, racism, bigotry and prejudice have not disappeared and will not on their own and can only be eliminated by continued education and discussion.

I would like to thank and congratulate Howard Driman, Barbara Rusch and their wonderful committee for their passion, diligence and commitment in once again providing an outstanding event. Now it is up to us - to learn and reflect.

With warm regards,

Michael Herman
Chairman,
Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto
UJA Federation

Howard Driman

Barbara Rusch

Once again, our annual Holocaust Education Week program is the largest to date, not by design, but, we are gratified to say, because more and more host organizations want to participate in the event. And, once again, we have to stress the obvious need for the Holocaust to be remembered, and its lessons to be taught. One would hope that these lessons would have been learned, but even in the last year, we have witnessed yet another example of religious and racial intolerance, with the apparently inevitable concomitant genocide. Our resolve is thereby strengthened - we must continue to provide for as wide a cross-section of the population as possible the tools for Holocaust remembrance and education, all in an effort to ensure that such a tragedy never recurs.

We believe that during Holocaust Education Week, we will be providing the citizens of the Greater Toronto Area with these tools, and it is our hope that they will avail themselves of the opportunity to attend as many programs as possible. We would like especially to see more young people, for it is they who will determine what the future holds.

We are indebted to the Toronto City Council for recognizing our work by proclaiming the period October 28 - November 9, 1999 to be "Holocaust Education Week," and to the Councils of Markham, Mississauga, Richmond Hill and Vaughan for their endorsement.

We would like to thank our committee members for their enthusiasm and dedication, and express our appreciation to all the participating organizations which enthusiastically commit their time and resources. A special debt of gratitude is due to the staff of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto.

"THE VOYAGE OF THE ST. LOUIS"

Scott Miller

Sarah Ogilvie

Sixty years ago this year, on May 13, 1939, more than 900 Jewish refugees fled Nazi Germany aboard the SS St. Louis, sailing to what they believed would be freedom. After being denied entry into Cuba, the United States and Canada, the ship was sent back to Europe - on the eve of World War II. Though the journey of the St. Louis is a well known story, one question has never been answered before: what happened to the passengers once they stepped foot on European soil?

SCOTT MILLER and SARAH OGILVIE, Research Historians at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., are attempting to answer this question by tracing the fate of all 937 passengers on board the St. Louis. Through a variety of media, they will describe how they embarked on an international search, using both research and detective methods, in an effort to find out what happened to the passengers. In revealing the passengers' individual stories, the consequences of a policy of inaction are revealed as well.

The luxury liner St. Louis had eight decks and accommodations for 400 first class and 500 tourist class passengers. The story of the ill-fated voyage was depicted in the highly-acclaimed 1976 film "Voyage of the Damned."

This program has been generously co-sponsored by the Abraham and Ida Moncik Memorial Fund for Holocaust Education.

"PHOTOGRAPHY OF THE HOLOCAUST AS HISTORICAL EVIDENCE."* DR. SYBIL MILTON was the Senior Historian at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum from 1986 to 1997 and is an internationally renowned speaker and author. The subject of this slide lecture, that of her latest book, is one that is largely unexplored, despite the documentary significance and emotional impact of the mass of existing visual records. These photographs, however, have not been analyzed as a form of historical data, and many powerful images have been blunted and manipulated by overuse. Dr. Milton will explore propaganda and media use of photographs, accuracy, and the role of the press in presenting photographs of the Holocaust.

This program has been generously co-sponsored by Judy and Bill Schwalm and family, in honour of their parents, Fanni and John Rev, Holocaust survivors.

"LIFE IS BEAUTIFUL" - DEBATE AND DISCUSSION

This Oscar-winning film evokes a multitude of views and strong emotions. It provokes all sorts of controversial questions about the representation of the Holocaust in cinema:

- Can it be appropriately treated in comic form?
- Do its historical inaccuracies necessarily lead to trivialization?
- Is Roberto Benigni being naïve by creating what he calls a "fable" about the Holocaust?

PROFESSOR STUART LIEBMAN, Ph.D., is Professor and Chair, Department of Media Studies at the City University of New York, and Coordinator of the University's Graduate School in Film Studies.

PROFESSOR JUDY DONESON, Ph.D., teaches Holocaust and film at Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri, and is the author of The Holocaust in American Film.

The speakers have diametrically opposed views on Life is Beautiful. They will discuss these, and explore the issues arising from the film.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION AND MEMORIAL CENTRE OF TORONTO

UJA FEDERATION

For more than a decade, the Holocaust Centre has been dedicated to the memory of the six million Jews murdered during twelve years of Nazi tyranny. Committed to the advancement of public awareness of the Holocaust and its lessons, it offers visitors of all ages an opportunity to share in the memory of the past and the responsibility for the future.

Since its opening, more than half a million visitors from the United States, the Caribbean, Europe, the Middle East, Asia, Australia and South Africa, including 200,000 Jewish and non-Jewish students from across Canada, have visited the Centre, learning the important lessons of tolerance, understanding and acceptance.

Visitors view audio-visual presentations that portray the experiences of European Jews before, during and after World War II. They see showcases containing memorabilia that enable them to witness first-hand the horror of the Holocaust, and experience the quiet and reflective Hall of Memories, where families have chosen to pay tribute to their loved ones by dedicating a tile in their memory.

School groups also have the opportunity to hear the personal testimony of one of the many Holocaust survivor speakers whose shining example of courage and dignity serves as a role model for a new generation.

The Holocaust Resource Centre, with its extensive library and hi-tech multi-media equipment with access to the worldwide Internet, serves all segments of the community.

The Holocaust Centre is located in the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto.

BIG CHIEF SPEAKER SITTING BURG

British Columbia grand chief Linda Prince [left picture] presented a traditional war head-dress to Knesset speaker Avraham Burg last week. Prince was part of a delegation of some 80 native North American leaders, representatives of about 40 tribes who visited Israel for Sukkot. Irwin Cotler to carry Liberal banner in Mount Royal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Irwin Cotler, who has spent much of the past 25 years travelling around the world for the cause of human rights, will be, barring an upset of historic proportions, the next member of Parliament for Mount Royal.

Cotler, 59, said no one is more surprised than he that today he finds himself about to be acclaimed the riding's Liberal candidate and fight a byelection expected in November. He had plans to teach at Jerusalem's Hebrew University next year. His wife Ariela was looking forward to returning to her native Israel.

Cotler insists he is answering a groundswell of grassroots support, and was not wooed by the party hierarchy.

The longtime McGill University law professor, perhaps most famous for his work to release Soviet refusenik Natan Scharansky, was at the end of last week, the only contender and awaiting acclamation at the party's nomination meeting Oct. 4 at Congregation Beth-El.

Irwin Cotler

Candidates can declare themselves up to Oct. 1, but it's improbable anyone will do so.

"I see becoming an MP as a continuation and intensification of the work I have done in promoting human rights," Cotler said in an interview. "There are things that I stand for and I don't intend to change that because I am in Parliament."

Since he has been an independent voice for so long, many wonder if Cotler will be comfortable toeing a party line. He takes the larger view.

"I have a lifetime commitment to broadening and deepening human rights internationally and domestically. Maybe the Kosovos and the East Timors could have been prevented if there had been less protracted debate and an amplified voice and vision for human rights in Parliament."

Cotler, who was president of Canadian Jewish Congress from 1980-83, will find himself in the same caucus with some people he has criticized over the years for dragging their feet on bringing suspected Nazi war criminals to justice. Cotler served as a counsel to the Deschênes commission of inquiry during the Mulroney government.

He plans to carry on with many of his international human rights interests, as head of InterAmicus,

The News in Brief

CANADA

First Nations Visit

VANCOUVER — Lynda Prince, a First Nations grand chief from Vancouver, led a contingent of 85 aboriginal leaders from across North America to Israel last week. The group was part of about 900 First Nations representatives from around the world to take part in Sukkot festivities and connect with the people of Israel. The delegates were scheduled to tour the country for five days, and meet with Prime Minister Ehud Barak. Prior to leaving, Prince said native people feel they have much in common with Jews.

Rabbi Plaut's Investiture

TORONTO — Rabbi Gunther Plaut, senior scholar at Holy Blossom Temple, will be invested as a senator of Abraham Geiger College for the training of rabbis and teachers in Potsdam, Germany. The investiture will take place Oct. 15 and will be held by the president of the college, Rabbi Walter Jacob, and the chair of the Union of Progressive Jews in Germany, Austria and Switzerland, Jan Muhlstein.

Rabbinic Council Formed

EDMONTON — Religious leaders from the city's three major synagogues have joined to form the Va'ad Ha'ir of Edmonton, the Edmonton Rabbinic Council. It is the first official rabbinic council in the city in 10 years, and encompasses Orthodox, Conservative and Reform congregations. Its first goal is to establish kashrut standards.

Staffing Changes

CALGARY — Todd Rockoff has been appointed acting executive director of the Calgary Jewish Centre. Joel Miller will now devote his energies to his full-time position as executive director of the Calgary Jewish Community Centre. The staffing changes are the result of a joint report by the two organizations, which recommended that the practice of sharing a single executive director between the two be discontinued.

ISRAEL

Pope to Visit

JERUSALEM — Pope John Paul will visit Israel and the Palestinian self-rule areas in March, the Vatican representative to Israel says. Although a papal visit has long been expected, Papal Nuncio Pietro Sambo's announcement provided the first official confirmation.

In Rome meantime, a Jewish family is attempting to regain the house in Poland where the Pope was born. Ron Balamuth, whose grandfather rented rooms to the pontiff's father in the town of Wadowice before World War II, visited Poland to investigate how he could recover title to the house, which now serves as a papal museum.

Sabbath Traffic Ruling

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court last week sided with secular petitioners against barring Sabbath traffic on several Jerusalem streets that are adjacent to haredi neighborhoods. The court ordered the Jerusalem municipality to explain why it had closed the streets.

WORLD

Embezzlement Charges

BERLIN — Israeli and German prosecutors are expected to file charges soon against attorneys in both countries suspected of embezzling hundreds of millions of dollars from a German pension fund intended for Holocaust survivors. The news magazine Der Spiegel reported that two attorneys in Tel Aviv and Berlin allegedly took some $600 million while posing as middlemen for processing pension fund applications. Israel first sought Germany's help in investigating the allegations in 1997.

Cemetery Desecrated

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina's president said he is appalled after vandals destroyed more than 60 tombstones at a Jewish cemetery near Buenos Aires on Sept. 19. "It is an act to be condemned in every sense," Carlos Menem said the day after the desecration. The La Tablada cemetery has been the target of several similar attacks, most recently in 1997.

Cardinal Apologizes

NEW YORK — New York Cardinal John O'Connor last week apologized for centuries of Catholic anti-Semitism. "I ask this Yom Kippur that you understand my own abject sorrow for any member of the Catholic Church, high or low, who may have harmed you or your forebears in any way," the cardinal said in a letter published Sept. 8 as a full-page ad in the New York Times. He referred to Pope John Paul's effort to make next year's Ash Wednesday, which falls on March 8, a day for Catholics to atone for centuries of anti-Semitism.

Himmler's Deal

LONDON — Heinrich Himmler, wartime leader of the SS, sought to win asylum for himself and 200 leading Nazis in the final days of World War II by offering cash and the freedom of 3,500 Jews held in concentration camps, according to classified British intelligence documents released here. According to the documents, the concentration camp inmates were to be sent to Switzerland in two trainloads.

Rightist Leader Threatens Party's Return

ROME — The announcement by an extreme right-wing leader here that he will revive his illegal hate group next month has renewed concerns about public displays of neo-Nazi sentiments.

Maurizio Boccacci, Rome's most prominent ultra-right-wing leader, told La Repubblica newspaper that he plans to relaunch his Movimento Politico on Oct. 28, despite a government ban on its operation.

The Political movement was banned and broken up in 1993 for its anti-Semitic and xenophobic activities.

Boccacci, 42, has been investigated more than 50 times for hate activities and militant neo-fascism. He described himself to La Repubblica as "fascist, Catholic traditionalist, anti-Zionist, racist."

Boccacci's announcement came amid mounting concern about neo-Nazi and fascist behavior among Italian soccer fans.

As in other European countries, some militant fans, including skinhead groups, use fascist and Nazi symbols to support their teams and sometimes use anti-Semitic slogans against opposing teams.

Frequent protests by Jewish and other groups have had little effect on these practices.

Orthodox Caucus hopes to 'sensitize' on ethics

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A prominent rabbi went to spend Shabbat at the home of a disciple. The family went to a great deal of effort to make everything as proper and as elegant as they could.

Flustered by all the preparations and the excitement, the hostess forgot to cover the challah before Kiddush. The embarrassed host berated her soundly.

"Explain it to me," said the rabbi to his host. "Why are you careful not to insult the dignity and honor of the challah, but it doesn't bother you to insult the dignity and honor of your wife?"

While there may sometimes appear to be a distinction between strict observance of Halachah and what might be termed mentschlichkeit, in fact, the sages have always stressed that compassion, ethical behavior and respect are essential aspects of religious observance.

The forgiveness that Jews pray for on Yom Kippur can only be given, according to tradition, for ment for sins against other people only comes if one asks for – and receives – forgiveness from the injured party.

In 1992, a group of religious leaders and lay men and women in the New York area founded The Orthodox Caucus, an organization designed, as its literature explains, "to sensitize Orthodox Jews to the demands and expectations of Torah and Halachah in matters of ethics and character excellence."

Rabbi Basil Herring, spiritual leader of the Atlantic Beach Jewish Centre, and executive chair of the caucus, told The CJN "there was a general sense that there was a need for a group of men and women to address issues that might arise, in an organized and efficient manner."

While there are organizations that deal with one aspect or another of the issues involved, "we felt there was a need to bring them [the organizations] together in a way that would transcend their individual agendas."

One of the Caucus' first concerns was the plight of the agunah, the woman whose husband refuses to

After a great deal of discussion, Rabbi Mordechai Willig wrote a prenuptial agreement in which a bride and groom agree that if the marriage dissolves, they will abide by the rulings of a mutually acceptable rabbinic court.

Rabbi Herring said more than half of the modern Orthodox weddings in the United States use the formulation, which, he said, has received broad-based halachic endorsement.

'Address responsibility issues'

The caucus is trying to "address responsibly issues and concerns of women," whose needs "must be addressed pro-actively," he said.

Matters being looked into include naming of baby girls; using women's names in prayers where it design of mechitzahs, the physical barriers separating men and women at prayer.

"Women should feel that they can hear, see and participate," he said, adding that the caucus hopes to publish a booklet of acceptable designs.

A rabbinic training program is also available, Rabbi Herring said, to give "talented young rabbis the skills to be dynamic leaders."

Another project is ROVE, Responsible Orthodox Views and Editorials, an e-mail program that gives reasoned and accurate responses to events of the day.

While the major support for the Orthodox Caucus is from the centrist or modern Orthodox, Rabbi Herring said they "make every effort to include any Orthodox leader or individual who sees merit in what we do. We prefer to be inclusive."

The caucus is financially independent, funded by the 150 members of its plenum. Special projects are funded by outside sources, such as individuals, foundations and federations.

efforts is the Torah Ethics Project, which focuses on "the centrality of ethical and character excellence in our relations with each other and with the world around us, [to] sensitize all Orthodox Jews to the demands and expectations of Torah and Halachah in the realm of ethical and civic virtue."

Topics include Ahavat Yisrael, love of fellow Jews; Shalom Bayit, peace within the home; and Dina D'malchuta Dina, the law of the land must be obeyed.

The Torah Ethics Project functions in a number of communities, including Manhattan, Bergen County, N.J., and greater Boston. Expansion is planned to other communities, including Toronto.

Co-ordinators of the Orthodox Caucus in Toronto are Rabbi Jay and Ilana Kelman. Rabbi Kelman is associate rabbi of Beth Jacob Congregation. Other Torontonians involved include Saul and Mira Koschitzky, Prof. Martin and Ruth Lokshin, Rabbis Chaim Sacknowitz, Moshe Shulman, Reuven Stern, Pinchas Tessler and Reuven

Transparent language

I do not intend to read his recently released book, A Republic, Not an Empire. Nor do I intend to read any of his books.

I do intend, however, to keep my ears tuned in to Pat Buchanan's public pronouncements. It is important for us to know what he and his followers are thinking.

Some people may argue that it is unfair, if not unreliable, to draw conclusions about the man based upon what others have written about him. My response is to agree with that proposition in the general case, but to proceed by way of exception in this specific case.

Buchanan is a known commodity. He and his opinions have been around for at least a decade. And there is enough material written or spoken about Pat Buchanan by credible and substantive commentators to justify this journalistic approach to the man.

As most CJN readers know, Buchanan is the journalist and TV personality who has twice offered himself as the Republican party candidate for president on a platform whose sharp, saw-toothed planks can be charitably described as populist, right-wing conservative, xenophobic "America-firstism."

Many of his opinions concerning Israel and the Jews of the United States have been denounced as anti-Semitic, even by such fellow right-wing conservatives as William F. Buckley.

Once again Buchanan is running for the presidency of the United States. As of this writing, however, it is not clear whether it will be for the Republicans or for the third party founded by Ross Perot earlier this decade, the Reform party, thankfully unrelated to the Canadian Reform party.

A Republic, Not an Empire is, essentially, Buchanan's policy book in the upcoming presidential elections. It was released last week and immediately drew fire from observers for a number of Buchanan's problematic propositions.

One such proposition stabbed at Jewish sensibilities in particular. Buchanan questioned the timing of the American entry into World War II, suggesting that it came too early, and according to some reports, implying that it could have been avoided altogether.

Pat Buchanan

He also commented, again, as reported in the New York Times, on the Jewish influence in the United States. "After World War II, Jewish influence over foreign policy became almost an obsession with American leaders."

There is a transparency, despite the deliberate opacity, to the substance and to the code-words of Buchanan's opinions that the many years of collective Jewish experience enable us to see through.

What should cause us concern is not that he is once again propagating the spurious and the specious. Rather it is that almost 20 percent of Americans said in a poll last week they would "consider" voting for him, and that George W. Bush, the Republican party's leading candidate for the presidential nomination, has not denounced Buchanan's views or decried the malicious intent behind them.

He's almost a nonagenarian. And at 89 years of age, he feels it is time to pass the editor's pen of his bi-weekly Yiddish column to someone younger.

Thus, in this issue of The CJN, after some eight years and 170 columns, the byline that appears in the Yiddish Vinkl, the Yiddish corner, belongs no longer to Sam Lipshitz but rather to Alek Silver.

As staff reporter Ben Rose writes elsewhere in this issue of The CJN, Lipshitz has "fought for Yiddish on all fronts." For having resourcefully and creatively carried on that fight in the pages of this newspaper, we and our readers owe him a special debt of gratitude and thanks.

The columns that Lipshitz compiled and occasionally wrote were always lively and informative, drawing upon the diminishing, though still deep, mostly untapped well of Yiddish-speaking and Yiddish-writing Canadian Jews.

Silver, a longtime friend and colleague of the Yiddish Vinkl's former editor, is an experienced editor in his own right (write) and an energetic Yiddishist, dedicated to the language and to the people for whom it is more an identity than a way of speaking.

We look forward to a long, imaginative, entertaining, and edifying relationship with Silver.

On behalf of our readers, we bid heartfelt thanks to Sam Lipshitz, and bid welcome to Alek Silver.

CJC sends out alert on New Age speaker

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has expressed deep concern to Hart House Theatre and Sumari Seminars over the latter's sponsorship of an upcoming appearance by British author David Icke at the theatre, on the University of Toronto's downtown campus.

Icke, who is in his 40s, is the author of And The Truth Will Set You Free and The Biggest Secret.

His writings are "so extreme [in terms of anti-Semitism] that it's frightening. The fact that he uses New Age as his umbrella to hide his anti-Semitism is even more frightening," said Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

In addition to the Oct. 6 Toronto lecture, Icke is also scheduled to speak at Ottawa's Kemptville College on Oct. 2 and 3, and at the Windsor Casino on Oct. 9 and 10.

At press time Monday, CJC had also alerted the Metropolitan Toronto Police hate crimes unit and Windsor's Jewish Federation.

CJC had plans to let immigration and customs officials, as well as bookstores, know their concerns.

"We're going to ask Immigration to brief [Icke] on what the laws are in Canada, and make him aware of the anti-hate laws, and that Canada would not stand idly by if the laws were broken, either through speech or the distribution or sale of materials deemed to violate the law," said Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations.

Icke was in Toronto in March to address two sessions of the Learning Annex, expounding on bizarre science fiction and conspiracy theories. Although he did not refer to Jews specifically at the time, he focused on a "global elite" that included the Rothschild banking family and former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger.

David Sersta, who operates the Learning Annex, monitored Icke's talks after being notified about his extremist views.

Hart House Theatre has a "complete freedom of speech policy," said theatre manager Janet Bessey.

Icke is "a huge problem," according to Farber, because of the numbers he attracts (200 and 300 respectively at his last Toronto appearances), and because of his focus on Jews.

His writings denounce the Talmud as racist and blame a secret Jewish cabal for world ills including the Holocaust. A former spokesperson for Britain's Green party, Icke was banned from addressing the party's 1994 convention because of anti-Semitic views expressed in his book, The Robots Rebellion.

Even if Icke doesn't say anything anti-Semitic in public, the fact that people may be attracted to his talks and start reading his books is "very disconcerting," said Farber.

"[Icke] didn't have any anti-Semitic comments to make in his speech the last time he was here, but it doesn't mean he won't do it this time, especially given the fact that this new book seems to be so infused with anti-Semitism. It's a real and legitimate concern that he might speak about those issues, and if he does, he may very well be in violation of the anti-hate law here in Canada," Farber said.

A call from The CJN to Sumari Workshops last week was not returned before press time, but the organization's Web site appears to represent New Age educational programs. An editorial policy of its online magazine states that written material should be "without prejudice, or gender, racial, spiritual, religious generalization."

CJC's Farber, who spoke to a representative of Sumari Seminars, said that their conversation "was not very productive." Congress has sent the group samples of Icke's writing and is awaiting their response.

Mugging not a hate crime

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Toronto police are satisfied that an attack against a 63-year-old Orthodox Jewish man last Friday afternoon was not a hate crime.

Lawrence Skolnik was followed into the parking garage in his apartment building at 2500 Bathurst St. by two men. Police say one of the men punched Skolnik repeatedly in the head. The two attackers then fled after stealing Skolnik's watch.

Although there were some suggestions from the media and one of the building's residents that the attack was racially motivated, police say robbery appeared to be the prime motive.

Skolnik lives in the same building as Jacob Lazar, who was attacked last month while walking to Torah Emeth Synagogue on Viewmount Avenue.

Lazar, 79, and Sy Miller, 66, were punched and beaten with a blunt object. Police have labelled the earlier attack a hate crime because of the location and because there was no attempt to rob the men.

Detectives from 13 Division have asked for the public's help in solving the crime. The two suspects are described as male, 5 foot 10, 150 to 160 pounds with short, dark hair.

Anyone with information is urged to call 1-800-8477 or 416-222-TIPS.

RICHARD ORVISS

Question: I have a policy with one of the life insurance companies that is demutualizing. What should I do ... take the shares or cash?

Answer: SB&C is not a stockbroker and so can not give advice about the particular merits of holding the shares; however, there is a common sense way for many people to draw the right conclusion on their own. Try to answer the following questions ... "If I had the cash in my hand today, would I consider going out to purchase shares in any company? If the answer is "no", you should likely take the cash. If you answer "yes" then ask "Is the life insurance industry, and in particular this company, one that I am familiar with and confident about?" If you do not feel well enough informed to make a good decision, you should either do the homework or take the cash; because, if you are not prepared to spend this time, then who will?

Question: What are the income tax implications of each alternative?

Answer: There is no current income tax to pay if you take shares. You will not pay any tax until you sell your shares and then on only 75% of the proceeds. If you take cash, it is considered a taxable dividend and must be added to your total income for the year. You will get a dividend tax credit that should reduce your total tax payable to about 2/3rds of your normal rate. To determine the tax impact in your particular situation, of taking either cash or shares, a quick call to your accountant is a good idea.

Question: So I've decided to take the cash offer, now what should I do?

Answer: This one is simple. Call your advisor and ask him/her to integrate this new money into your existing financial plan. If you don't have an advisor, or are considering making a change, call us! There are many good ideas available today but not all are appropriate for every investor. A good advisor will help you choose what is best for you to achieve your goals.

The aftermath of last Friday morning's hit-and-run death of Moshe Nussbaum, 88, at the corners of Bathurst Street and Joicey Boulevard. [Ron Csillag photo]

Orthodox leader, 88, killed in hit-and-run on way to shul

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shock and sadness greeted the tragic death last Friday of 88-year-old Moshe Nussbaum, a pillar of Toronto's Orthodox community, and the victim of a hit-and-run in the Bathurst-Wilson neighborhood.

Nussbaum was on his way, alone, to a pre-dawn Talmud class and morning services at Agudath Israel Congregation on McGillivray Avenue when he was struck by a car at the corners of Bathurst Street and Joicey Boulevard at about 5:15 a.m.

He was pronounced dead of massive internal injuries at the scene.

An autopsy performed only hours later confirmed Nussbaum died from being hit by the car.

But according to police, he was already prone on the street when he was struck.

"He was alive when he was hit," Det. Tom Fullarton of Toronto's police traffic services told The CJN on the scene. "What we're trying to determine is why he was lying down." Police suspect he either stumbled or fainted.

The autopsy showed Nussbaum did not have a heart attack, as was previously suspected.

The autopsy proved to be a sensitive matter, as Halachah prohibits the procedure. But it was carried out, because police needed to know what caused Nussbaum's death should the driver be caught. The fact that the driver fled has made this a criminal investigation, police said.

Family members and rabbis requested there be no autopsy, Jim Young, chief coroner of Ontario, told The CJN.

"We listened very hard. We attempted to accommodate [them] and we looked for alternatives. But the conclusion was that an autopsy would provide necessary information.

"We tried to do it with a minimum of disruption and in a manner as acceptable as possible to the Jewish community," Young said.

He added that a rabbi was in the room during the procedure.

As of Monday, there were no arrests.

Police described the car as a black sport utility vehicle, and the driver as an Asian man, aged 45 to 49, between 5-foot-1 and 5-foot-5, with greying hair and a moustache. He had a passenger.

Fullarton said the driver "had a conversation" with a passerby before making a U-turn and speeding off north on Bathurst.

One problem was early-morning rain, "which washed a lot of evidence into the sewers," he noted.

Almost immediately after the accident, several Orthodox men gathered at the scene and recited Tehillim (Psalms) over the body.

Later, as the curious looked on, Jews rushed to morning services and to buy lulavim and etrogim for Sukkot.

Community members described Nussbaum as a revered leader and much-loved elder statesman.

The scene at Agudath Israel Congregation, a bit north of the accident site, was sombre. Teenage boys and young men gathered for Torah study.

"He was a very happy, energetic man," said one young student.

Nussbaum was one of the founders of the Agudah movement in Toronto, and of Agudath Israel Congregation, reports The CJN's Leila Speisman.

He was still active on the Vaad Hapoel Agudath Israel, the governing body of the International Agudah organization. He was also active in Eitz Chaim schools, and was a founder of Bais Yaakov High School.

In addition, he helped found Camp Agudah in Port Carling, and Perspectives, the newspaper of Toronto Agudah.

Shmuel Klein, editor of Perspectives, described him as "a firebrand in his younger years. He had a great sense of humor. He was effervescent."

Nussbaum was born in the Galician town of Dzikow. The family moved to Holland, Belgium and Cuba to escape World War II. They came to Canada in the 1940s.

Nussbaum is survived by his wife, four children, 18 grandchildren and 12 great-grandchildren.

Hundreds turned out for his funeral last Friday, only hours before Sukkot began.

So that ideals may shine once again

This newspaper has rarely, if ever, commented in an editorial, upon a prospective election candidate's winning the party's nomination in his or her riding. After all, winning the right to represent a specific party is but a preliminary stage of any election. The ultimate contest still remains to be fought.

But the news last week out of the federal riding of Mount Royal, in Montreal, that Irwin Cotler will likely be acclaimed its Liberal party candidate, is worthy of comment in this space. The former member of Parliament for the riding, Sheila Finestone, was appointed to the Senate last month. The byelection is expected in November.

The modern history of that riding suggests the Liberal party nominee will be its member of Parliament. But it is not the virtual certainty of Cotler's election to the House of Commons that evokes these comments; it is the set of values and beliefs that his election promises to bring into the Commons, that sets our heart to stirring.

In 1999, as we prepare to tear away the last page on this year's Julian calendar, the concept of the sanctity and the inviolability of individual human rights is well established, if not well observed, in international law. But it has not always been so this century, this half-century, or even this decade. There are few people on earth who know and understand this lachrymose fact better than the Jewish people.

Irwin Cotler is renowned and respected worldwide for his indefatigable advocacy on behalf of human rights. With the courage and charisma of a biblical prophet, Cotler has helped to plant and nurture the seed of human rights in the ashen, tear-soaked, post-World War II soil. That seed, along with countless others, has been carried to near and far away places by the sheer force, passion and integrity of Cotler's personality.

When Anatoly Sharansky was cast into the dark brutality and anonymity of the Soviet penal gulag some 25 years ago, it was Cotler, in Moscow and at considerable personal risk, who confronted the procurator jailer, thereby helping to set in motion a train of events whose unyielding forward momentum eventually led to the Refusenik's release. Sharansky was not the exception in Cotler's caseload, it was the rule.

Will the discipline and the demands of the party system in caucus and, one day, it is hoped, in cabinet prove too confining, or worse, too dispiriting for the free and impassioned expressions of a crusader's conscience? Time will tell.

Cotler himself sees no conflict between the two frameworks. "I see becoming an MP as a continuation and intensification of the work I have done in promoting human rights," Cotler told The CJN. "There are things that I stand for and I don't intend to change that because I am in Parliament." It is precisely because of this attitude, so self-confident, so full of conviction, even if seemingly tinged with naiveté, that our hearts are set to stirring.

For, in the current state of public life, the tarnished ideal of a just, caring and compassionate society, may yet be burnished by the example of Irwin Cotler in the House of Commons, so that it shines once again in the sun.

Danger in nationalism condoning terrorism

In strong contradistinction to your editorial view (Sept. 16), I do not feel that Israel can be lauded as a "rare democracy" because of the decision of its Supreme Court regarding Shin Bet "interrogation" methods. Dan Yakir, the lawyer for the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, remarked that "it was the only decision they could have handed down. On the other hand, the Supreme Court does not have a very impressive record in defending human rights in light of security claims." (New York Times, Sept. 7)

To this remark, let me ask why a "rare democracy" has used torture for decades, and why its Supreme Court only now has taken up the case. I believe that the answer to this question is entirely political in nature, due to the current political process and other "admissions" that Israel is now making, to, I feel, its grave detriment.

What Israel is choosing to say, and write in its textbooks, will soon find its way into new Palestinian textbooks, if not into broad anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli works, affirming the duplicity of pre-state Zionist and Israeli moral claims over the years.

In this regard, who has not defended Israel's claims and actions over the years in the face of the terrible acts of terrorism Israel has endured? Yossi Beilin has now presented what is clearly a revisionist legal argument that absolves past acts of terrorism. I would argue that it absolves terrorists of the future. Beilin says that one cannot free Israelis who killed Arabs (in response to Palestinian terrorism), but one can free Palestinians who murdered Jews for "nationalistic" reasons. Such cause, Beilin's argument indicates, is understandable and ground for clemency. With this decision the whole history of terrorism against Israel is whitewashed.

Palestinians will now read the history of Israel and make the case that Israel, aware over the years of the legitimate political grievances of the Palestinians, used alleged terrorist acts (read now, acts of nationalistic grievance) in its propaganda, towards furthering its own expansive nationalistic and territorial goals.

Mekorot offers serious learning for women

Re: letter to Editor, "Need Courses for Female Day School Grads." (CJN, Sept. 9)

The writer of this letter was obviously not aware of Mekorot Institute for Torah Study for Women launched in May 1999 at a meeting attended by over 500 enthusiastic women to fill the need for a place of higher Jewish learning for women in Toronto.

Mekorot offers a program of serious Jewish learning for women of the Greater Toronto Area, with the goal of making accessible to its students the full range of traditional Jewish texts. Courses will be of the highest calibre, matching the standards for academic challenge and excellence afforded to women in every other area of higher education.

We are confident that the courses offered will fill the thirst for serious Jewish learning expressed in the letter by Miriam Snowbell-Buckler and we urge her, and others like her, to join us in building this fledgling Institute. The first courses are to begin the week of Oct. 4, and we invite your readers to call Mekorot at 416-398-1510 for further details.

Questions motivation of protest groups at Kotel

Contrary to what Jean Gerber writes (Opinion column, CJN, Sept. 16), no Jew of any group or belief is denied access to the Kotel. But when Reform and Conservative groups purposely organize themselves into groups of mixed genders, that is a terrible denigration of the holiness of the place to Orthodox Jews. It is easy to see that a deference to the form of public worship that is acceptable to all would be a reasonable and peaceful solution to this problem.

One may well wonder at the motivations of such groups altogether, for, just like Gerber, there is no intrinsic holiness to the Kotel for them, and it would certainly be welcome news if the Reform and Conservative camps began to pray for the rebuilding of the Temple. So why are they there at all?

One is unfortunately driven to the conclusion that their motivation is perhaps as much political as it is religious, that really their gatherings are meant to be provocative and are calculated to elicit the reactions they do indeed get.

Let us hope that in future all Jews will come to pray at the Kotel with no hidden agendas and that all will respect the millennia-old norms of worship of the Beit Hamikdash.

Is Sergei Slapshotnik on the way?

Your most recent sports section contained two stories of Jewish athletes, a tennis player named Smashnova and a Greco-Roman grappler named Gotcha. Come now. While we would all like to see more Jews become prominent athletes, the absence of Jews in this arena should not lead to the fabrication of such persons. What's next, a Russian émigré named Sergei Slapshotnik?

A trial that has resounded through history

The following is part 2 of the essay begun last week marking 100 years of the pardon Alfred Dreyfus received after he was convicted a second time for a crime he did not commit.

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

France Divided Against Itself

In France the Dreyfus saga was to continue occupying front pages for 11 more years. Newspapers would rave and rant, demonstrations would rock the streets of France and Algeria, governments would fall, and even the constitution would be changed.

Society was deeply divided. There were those who sensed a miscarriage of justice or who felt that the hostility to Jews was overdone. This group came to be known as the Dreyfusards, and consisted mainly of liberals, some socialists and various intellectuals. The opposing group were known as anti-Dreyfusards, and consisted of conservatives, the Catholic clergy and their close followers, people associated with the military, and anti-Semites from all walks of life.

In 1895, the anti-Dreyfusards constituted the overwhelming majority. In due course, this changed, but only very gradually. It would take four years before the tide turned and Dreyfus was freed; and then an additional seven years before his final exoneration.

During this period, France went through 11 prime ministers, which is an indication of the extent of the social unrest racking the country.

In 1896, a new chief of intelligence was appointed, Major Picquart. He stumbled upon some startling documents, and after thorough investigation he adduced overwhelming evidence that the real traitor was another staff officer, Major Esterhazy.

Accordingly, Esterhazy was charged and tried in 1897, but a guilty verdict would have undermined the honor of the army, whose courts had pronounced Dreyfus to be the culprit. So Esterhazy was found not guilty and released, and he became an immediate hero among the anti-Dreyfusards.

Picquart, who had produced the evidence against Esterhazy was himself put on trial, found guilty and sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment.

The foreign press by now recognized that Dreyfus was clearly innocent, and declared that France had taken leave of its senses. To this, the anti-Dreyfusard press responded that the fate of a Jew is insignificant in comparison to the honor of the army.

Church Allied with Army Against Jews

The Catholic clergy energetically agitated against re-examination of the Dreyfus case, and the Vatican secretary of state was one of several church leaders who referred to such re-examination as a Jewish plot. The anti-Dreyfus invective was preached in thousands of churches, and the mobs marched through the streets accordingly. Throughout France, Jews were molested and their property pillaged, while police stood by.

The most violent persecutions occurred in Algeria. It is noteworthy that the Arabs of Algeria actively sought to protect the Jews. Mosques were opened for Jewish refuge, and Muslim leaders publicly protested. (The Arabs of North Africa later took the same position when the Vichy French persecuted Jews during World War II.)

In 1898, the eminent French writer, Emile Zola, wrote his famous J'Accuse! in which he passionately laid out the facts for the government and people of France to see. It was published on page 1 by L'Aurore, the newspaper edited by Georges Clemenceau, who had long been convinced of the perversion of justice against Dreyfus, and who was to become world famous as the prime minister of France before, during and after World War I.

Rays of Light

Zola's declaration moved many readers to the Dreyfusard side, especially intellectuals. But the army counter-attacked by having Zola himself charged with bringing dishonor to the army. He was tried, found guilty and sentenced to a fine and imprisonment. He escaped to England, and carried on the battle from there.

The tide was beginning to turn, and more evidence kept surfacing in favor of Dreyfus. An officer who had presented evidence against Dreyfus now admitted that those documents were forged, and thereupon he committed suicide. Esterhazy, who had been proclaimed not guilty, now suddenly left France, and confided his guilt. The government was forced to call for a new trial of Dreyfus, and he was brought back to France in August 1899.

This second Dreyfus trial took place that month in Rennes, and by now his innocence had been proven beyond doubt. But this was again a military court, and the two imperatives of anti-Semitism and the honor of the army still prevailed. The judges, in a 5 to 2 split, again found him guilty, but with "extenuating circumstances." His sentence was reduced to 10 years, of which five had already been served.

Justice Gradually Prevails

The verdict was so absurd, and much of the French public was by now so aroused against the anti-Dreyfusards, that the government had to act. They were afraid to antagonize the army; so the two court decisions were not nullified. But Dreyfus was granted a pardon and set free on Sept. 20, 1899.

The battle for exoneration and military reinstatement continued for seven more years. Finally, in July 1906, Dreyfus was declared totally innocent, restored to his military status, and promoted to major. In a military ceremony, he was decorated with the Legion of Honor. Picquart, who had been imprisoned for advocating justice, was appointed minister of war.

The previous December France had amended its constitution. The principal new provisions were separation of church and state, and curtailment of the powers and privileges of the Catholic clergy.

Opinions

A letter worth reading

Just before Rosh Hashanah and then again before Yom Kippur, a remarkable letter was published as a full-page spread in the New York Times.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Just in case you did not already read it, I take the liberty of quoting it in full below, for it indicates the remarkable turn the Roman Catholic Church has taken.

There was some criticism of an earlier Vatican's statement vis-à-vis the role of the Church with regard to the Jews in years past, but this letter strikes a different tone and will speak for itself.

It was originally written by the cardinal to some of his closest Jewish friends, but Elie Wiesel and two associates published it in the best-read newspaper in the world. Note that, in deference to the cardinal's Orthodox friends, the Divine name was spelled with a hyphen.

My Dearest Friends:

The Jewish High Holy Days come once again, reminding our world of who created it, who blesses it with life and who judges it in his merciful justice. G-d who gives all humanity the dignity of being made in His image has chosen Israel as His particular people that they may be an example of faithfulness for all the nations of the earth. With sincere love and true admiration for your fidelity to the Covenant, I am happy once again to send my greetings for a blessed New Year.

This Sabbath evening, as the celebration of Rosh Hashanah commences, a new decade will begin. During the year of 5760, we Christians will start a new era of the year 2000, the turn of another millennium in our history. Our Holy Father, Pope John Paul II, has asked all Christians to enter this new millennium in the spirit of Jubilee. Part of the process of Jubilee is a call for tshuvah, or repentance. Ash Wednesday, March 8, has been specially set aside as a day for Catholics to reflect upon the pain inflicted on the Jewish people by many of our members over the last millennium. We most sincerely want a new era.

I pray that as you begin a new decade, and as we begin another millennium in our Jewish-Christian relationship, we will refresh our encounter with a new respect and even love for one another as children of G-d. Working in our own ways, but also working together, let us both remain committed to the fulfilment of G-d's reign.

I ask this Yom Kippur that you understand my own abject sorrow for any member of the Catholic Church, high or low, including myself, who may have harmed you or your forebears in any way.

Be assured of my prayers and friendship. L'shanah tovah tikateivu!

Faithfully,
John Cardinal O'Connor
Archbishop of New York

Human rights vs. security

No other issue in recent history has rocked Israeli liberals as much as the Supreme Court ruling outlawing the use of physical force in interrogation by the Shin Bet, the General Security Service (GSS). The unprecedented decision placed the Court firmly on one side of the ongoing debate and inherent tension between democratic principles and the imperatives of security in the Israeli experience.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Earlier this month, an enlarged panel of nine judges unanimously accepted seven petitions which had been submitted against the use of physical force and torture during interrogations of suspects – usually Palestinians suspected of terrorist acts. In its ruling, the Court stated that GSS investigators hold no more power than regular police investigators.

The judges stated unequivocally that measures taken by the GSS were illegal, although they acknowledged the difficulty the decision would create for the GSS in carrying out its activities. This is the first time that the Court has challenged the primacy of security concerns. Historically, it has supported the government's use of this claim and has upheld actions that were legally questionable.

The recent ruling is an extreme example of the impact of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. This statute and several other, relatively new Basic Laws provide the basis for an Israeli constitution, which may be enacted in the future. In the meantime, the Basic Laws have resulted in a number of Supreme Court rulings that have outlawed common practices in a number of areas.

The ruling stunned the Israeli political community and since its publication, has sharply focused the debate on security concerns in a democratic society. It also comes against the backdrop of an ongoing debate over the practices of the Shin Bet.

The cloak of silence that was historically imposed over its activities has been pierced repeatedly since the famous Bus 300 incident of 1984, in which the killing of an apprehended Palestinian terrorist was covered up within the service. Then President Chaim Herzog granted a controversial pardon to senior Shin Bet personnel, even before any indictments were issued, in order to prevent what he felt would become a media and public witch-hunt against an essential, effective national agency.

Three years later, a commission headed by then Supreme Court Justice Moshe Landau authorized the Shin Bet to use "moderate physical force" only if it was necessary in order to save human lives. The issue was what is called the "ticking bomb" – a scenario in which a suspect may have knowledge about an imminent threat to human lives. Since then, there have been repeated petitions to the Supreme Court over practices of investigators, while reports of coverups continue in the media.

In practice, the Shin Bet broadened the Landau Commission's mandate and used various practices in interrogation that were tacitly acknowledged as being necessary, given the particular circumstances of Israeli life. Now, the Court has said that new legislation is the only way to condone these questionable practices, which were graphically described in the ruling.

The latest ruling will force a new, uncomfortable transparency on the Shin Bet, and many argue that this may reduce its effectiveness. Indeed, the very public nature of the debate thus far is a new phenomenon, that is indicative of the demythologizing of the security services and the historic ethos surrounding their activities.

The result is a serious dilemma that has pitted liberals against one another. Some say the ruling is premature given the exigencies of Israel's predicament, and they are calling for new legislation to allow physical force in the case of a ticking bomb. Others argue that Israel cannot possibly enact legislation condoning torture, and that the ticking-bomb scenario is sufficiently covered by existing statutes.

While Elyakim Rubinstein, the legal advisor to the cabinet, supports new legislation, Minister of Justice Yossi Beilin vehemently opposes it. Prime Minister Ehud Barak is sensitive to the Shin Bet's concerns, but has no choice but to support the Court's ruling. He has formed a committee to recommend the next steps, and the debate over these is likely to be heated.

Fortunately, this dilemma is foreign to Canadians. But it exists in other democracies. In Britain, after 1200 people died in terrorist attacks over four years, the domestic and international criticism over methods of interrogation of IRA suspects resulted in legislation outlawing such practices. The Israeli ruling aligns Israel with other western countries, and it represents an important step in its conscious acceptance of the responsibility of a democracy.

The judges said it best. "This is the fate of a democracy – which does not consider all means legitimate, and for which not every method used by its enemies is available. Not infrequently, a democracy must fight with one hand tied behind its back. Despite this, democracy has the upper hand, because preservation of the rule of law and recognition of individual liberties are an important component of its concept of security."

Reflections about Birthright Israel

Most readers of this column have by now heard of the ambitious program, Birthright Israel. It is the initiative spearheaded by philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhart, to help bring Jewish youth closer to Israel, and thereby to Jewish life.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The bold initiative is a tripartite collaboration involving private philanthropists, the Israeli government and local Jewish communities. The ultimate objective is to provide all Jewish youth age 15 to 26, in North America and perhaps elsewhere, with an opportunity to experience Israel. Young Jews who have not yet been on a communally organized trip to Israel would receive vouchers, which they could apply to a recognized tour, covering airfare and 10 days of an organized stay offered through recognized tour providers.

In addition, there are hopes to offer every Jewish child a gift of $180 at birth, which could then grow over time to finance such a trip. The entire program is to be kicked off this January and February with an initial college effort to send, according to one insider, several thousand teens and young adults to Israel. Recruiters are now busy on college campuses, working through Hillels.

The project is new, and some of the initial reporting about it has been sloppy. For example, the Sept. 10 issue of the Forward creates the impression that the entire amount of $60 million per year, or $300 million for the first five years, would be used for the Israel trips. This would suggest a cost of about $10,000 or more per trip, obviously ludicrous.

It is not immediately clear to the Jewish public – and probably not to the organizers – how much of these large amounts represents brand new dollars, how much represents reallocations, and how exactly they will be spent. But by any yardstick, it is an impressive venture. It is an exercise in top-down Jewish communal engineering.

Some communal leaders may question whether trips to Israel are the best way to wage this "continuity" battle. After all, Jewish schooling, Jewish summer camps, or taking Jewish studies courses, all have similar payoffs as routes to enhancing Jewish identity.

Still, the idea is a good one, and one has to start somewhere! No harm can come from sending North American youth ages 15 to 26 to Israel. But there are some issues which can still be debated.

Should these trips be free? Perhaps some token payment of a few hundred dollars could be requested to demonstrate at least a minimal degree of seriousness on the part of those lucky enough to be chosen. And these modest amounts could be used to help even more students attend.

Who should be eligible? One logical decision is that students who have already gone on an organized Israel trip are ineligible. Still, the program organizers are struggling between two concepts.

The "value added" idea is similar to that of "outreach." You target the more alienated, uninvolved Jewish kids, where you might get more bang for your buck. The trip can make a huge difference, perhaps turning them on to things Jewish for the first time.

The other concept is akin to "inreach," or, as the saying goes, "the best customer is the one who is already in the store." Jewish students who already have some involvement or a stronger background, or who have taken a Jewish studies course or two. An Israel experience here would build on strength, and could be well integrated into previous positive Jewish experiences.

Ideally, the trips should combine both types of students, rather than focus on the former as seems to be the tilt of the Hillel leaders who are the organizers. This has led to a debate about the right balance between fun and education on these trips. Some fear the educational content would be diluted. A set of minimal standards for such trips, many of which will be provided by experienced, existing organizations, is being developed.

In the words of an old Hebrew saying, kol hatchalot kashot, or "all beginnings are difficult." I agree with sociologist Steven Cohen that what is important is the symbolic fact that the organized Jewish community is launching this major new initiative. And a certain percentage of the lucky travellers will probably be turned on to their Jewish identity in a way that would not have happened otherwise.

The Kirshner File

Aimee & Jaguar, an unconventional love story

It was an unlikely and tragic love story which unfolded in wartime Nazi Germany. Author Erica Fischer has set it to words.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Fischer's book, the poignant Aimee & Jaguar, has been translated into a dozen languages, including Hebrew. The Israeli edition was published recently.

Aimee & Jaguar has aroused widespread interest. Three television documentaries, as well as a full-length feature film, have been made about its protagonists, Felice Schragenheim (Jaguar) and Elisabeth Wust (known as Aimee or Lilly).

The pair met in a Berlin coffee shop in November 1942. By race, they were different, but in terms of temperament they were seamlessly compatible, as time would tell.

Felice was a "submarine," a German Jew living underground in fear of her life, never knowing when she would be apprehended by the police.

Elisabeth, a perfect Aryan by Nazi norms, was a mother of four boys and the wife of an army officer stationed at the front.

Ineradicably drawn to each other, they formed a romantic relationship that lasted until Felice was betrayed by an informer.

To this day, Elisabeth still mourns for Felice, who died in Bergen-Belsen in 1945, Fischer said in an interview during a recent visit to Toronto under the auspices of the Goethe Institut.

When they were introduced, Elisabeth was a conventional, heterosexual woman with ingrained anti-Semitic attitudes.

She claimed that she could "smell out" Jews. When Berlin was bombarded by Allied aircraft, she blamed Jews for the devastating air raids.

"She was simply repeating things she had heard," said Fischer. "She was a product of her times."

Ironically, Elisabeth's brother, who was killed in the Spanish Civil War, was half-Jewish, the offspring of her mother's affair with a Jew.

In May 1943, a month after their first kiss, which initiated Elisabeth into the realm of lesbianism, Felice disclosed that she was Jewish.

"By then, Elisabeth was hopelessly in love and infatuated with Felice, who had been a lesbian since about the age of 16. She didn't care that Felice was Jewish."

Elisabeth divorced her husband, a Nazi by conviction but not by party membership, and moved in with Felice, whose parents had died in the 1930s. For about two years, they enjoyed a blissful existence insulated from the savagery of Nazi Germany.

Felice, who would have been 77 today had she survived, could have left Germany in safety, said Fischer, whose own parents were refugees from Nazi-occupied Austria. She and her parents returned to Vienna from Britain after the war.

Elisabeth could have gone to Palestine to join her stepmother, but she had no particular desire to live in the Middle East.

There was a chance to go to Switzerland, but she missed it.

Felice wanted to immigrate to the United States, but after the U.S. declared war on Germany in 1941, her American visa was as good as dust.

A month before she met Elisabeth, Felice received notice of her deportation. Vulnerable as one of the last remaining Jews left in Germany, she went into hiding, joining approximately 6,000 other "submarines" in Berlin, whose Jewish population before Hitler's accession to power in 1933 had been 180,000.

Rounded up by the Gestapo, Felice was taken to the Theresienstadt concentration camp in the former Czechoslovakia. Unable to join Felice there, Elisabeth corresponded with her. These precious letters still remain in her possession.

Felice arrived in Auschwitz in October 1944. Soon afterwards, she found herself in Bergen-Belsen, where she met her untimely demise.

Following the war, Elisabeth devotedly compiled a "book of tears," copying all the letters and poems she and Felice had ever written to each other.

Felice (right) and Elisabeth, 1944

In her heart of hearts, Fischer said, Elisabeth hoped that Felice would return to her someday. When she failed to appear, Elisabeth fell into a depression.

She tried to convert to Judaism, but the rabbinic authorities turned her away. Fischer is not sure why she was rejected.

Never quite regaining the middle-class status she once enjoyed and to which she was accustomed, Elisabeth supported herself and her children as a cleaning lady and attendant in a textile company.

As fate would have it, Eberhard, one of her sons, converted to Judaism at 18. A gifted linguist, he mastered Latin and Greek before learning Hebrew. In 1961, he settled in Israel. Eberhard, an archivist at the Hebrew University, now lives in Jerusalem.

"Only when she visits Eberhard in Israel does her joy of life return. She feels comfortable in Israel, she's among her own," Fischer said.

A resident of Berlin since 1988, she was commissioned by her publisher to write Aimee & Jaguar. Elisabeth's love affair with Felice burst into the open in the mid-1980s after Berlin's Senate awarded her a medal for saving three Jewish women before the war had ended.

"Elisabeth was 79 when I met her," said Fischer, a British-born journalist and translator who has written several books about feminism and women's issues.

"She was very headstrong and had a fantastically strong voice and an incredible memory. She was lonely, lived in isolation and was quite poor."

Recalling her initial encounter with Elisabeth, Fischer said that she presented herself as an anti-fascist whose father had been a communist.

More to the point, to Fischer's delight, Elisabeth was more than willing to discuss her life with Felice. Indeed, she was obsessed with the subject.

Elisabeth, 87, has done well by Aimee & Jaguar, which was first published in 1994.

No longer poverty-stricken ("she gets a share of my royalties"), something of a media-wise celebrity, and with more friends than she has ever had, Elisabeth has been transformed by Fischer's book.

Fischer, however, is not as enamored of Elisabeth today as she was originally. "When I heard about her anti-Semitic background, I was quite upset. I asked her to talk about it, but she refused. After a few attempts, I just gave up, and didn't feel so at ease with her anymore."

By Fischer's reckoning, Elisabeth is hardly unique among Germans in her reluctance to face the past courageously and unambiguously. "This 'culture of silence' just goes on. Lilly always referred to 'the Germans,' not realizing that she was part of the same generation." Fischer paused, saying, "I don't meet her anymore."

Fischer, too, is disappointed by the quality of the German, French and British TV documentaries based on Aimee & Jaguar. "I didn't like any of them. They were too sentimental, too much centred on Elisabeth and not political enough. The movie is better, though it does not pick up my critical attitude to Lilly."

Directed by Max Farberbock, Aimee & Jaguar opened this year's Berlin Film Festival. "It was a great day for Lilly," Fischer observed.

The film may be reshot in English. Fischer is certain that it would appeal to a wide cross-section of viewers on this side of the Atlantic. "I think a North American audience would be fascinated by Aimee & Jaguar."

She is probably right. As a love story, it is certainly unique.

AGONY AND ECSTACY:

MOSES THE MAN, ISRAEL THE NATION

The series will take a close look at Moses and the formation of Israel as a people. How did Moses manage to balance his humility with the spotlight of leadership? Our greatest leader spoke with a stutter and faced challenge after challenge. Yet, he attained the closest relationship with the Creator and transformed Israel from slavery to nationhood. Through Biblical and Midrashic texts we will form a portrait of one of the most complex individuals in human history.

Shavuot and Simchat Torah

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the High Holy Days come to an end we have celebrated many cycles.

With Rosh Hashanah we celebrate the cycle of the New Year; with Sukkot we celebrate the cycle of the rains and we pray they continue to recycle; and with Simchat Torah, we celebrate the cycle of the Torah readings.

As we dance with the Torah, we conclude the final readings in Deuteronomy and immediately celebrate the first readings of Genesis. But what exactly is being celebrated?

Later in the year, on the holiday of Shavuot, we rejoice over receiving the Torah and we commit ourselves once again to the experience at Sinai and all its implications. It is at this time that we celebrate the Torah as an entity received by Israel. How then is Simchat Torah different from Shavuot?

On Shavuot we study Torah all night but we do not dance with the Torah scrolls. Why do we dance on Simchat Torah?

It is a question of distinguishing between the concrete and the abstract. At Mount Sinai we received the written Torah, a concrete substance, something we can touch and hold. On Simchat Torah we commemorate the conclusion of the reading of this document – we have studied it and shared it publicly for an entire year. We are celebrating the abstract process of studying the Torah.

Reverse the realities

Interestingly, we reverse these realities in the way we celebrate each holiday. Although Shavuot commemorates the concrete, we celebrate by engaging in study all night long. In other words, we surround ourselves with the abstract process of studying in order to mark the concrete receiving of the Torah.

Likewise, on Simchat Torah, although we are celebrating the completion of an abstract process of study, we commemorate that process by engaging in the concrete holding and dancing with the Torah scrolls.

Why do we engage in what seems to be an inconsistent reversal? Would it not make more sense to dance and hold the Torah on Shavuot and study all night on Simchat Torah?

One answer can be found in a midrash from Talmud Berakhot. There it states that we must respect an elderly person even if, through unavoidable circumstances, that person has forgotten the knowledge they once possessed.

The example brought to prove this view is that the Ark of the Covenant contained both the whole Ten Commandments tablets and the original shattered ones. That is, elderly persons who have engaged in the process of learning are to be respected because of the example they represent, the process in which they engaged.

They are the embodiment of concrete and abstract brought into one. They serve as the model of what Torah truly is – the unity of both the physical and the philosophical – the body and the soul.

On Shavuot we state that this duality cannot be separated, on Simchat Torah we affirm the same commitment. The Torah is both a concrete scroll and an endless process. We are a people who celebrate the weavings of physical and spiritual. We study and we dance.

Renewal and celebrations

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Friday night, the festival of Sukkot concludes and is immediately followed by another joyous holiday, Shemini Atzeret/Simchat Torah. One day in Israel, two elsewhere, this is a time for completions, renewals and celebrations.

On Shemini Atzeret, we say goodbye to the sukkah and an official hello to blustery weather, with the beautiful Prayer for Rain. You can read more about the blessing and how so much of ancient Jewish history revolved around water (such as the story of Moses who was drawn from water and then saved his people by parting waters) [http://www.ou.org/chagim/shmini-simchat/]. Click on another link and have the prayer sung to you.

One of the highlights of Simchat Torah are the hakafot, the dancing with the Torah scrolls. Kids usually take part in the celebrations, flag in hand. For a home-made touch, start with some of the holiday pictures that can be printed, colored in, and attached to a wooden dowel [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/sukkot/sukotclr.htm]. Or you can try your hand at a more elaborate flag using muslim, buttons and lace [http://uahc.org/educate/parent/0203.html].

Other good places to visit: the Department for Jewish-Zionist Education [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/tish/37.h.ml] and [http://pages.nyu.edu/~asr209/simchatora.html]. The Celebrate with JOI site includes the dilemma faced by the people of Chelm. Their problem: What kind of floor should be used in their synagogue? The wise men are dumfounded until they reach their (typically) sage solution [http://www.joi.org/celebrate/simtor/].

Since Simchat Torah is a time for beginnings, Yosef Abramowitz and Rabbi Susan Silverman suggest that this is an ideal time to start attending weekly services or having home study sessions [http://shamash.org/jfl/article/simchatdancing.html].

Erez Miller's family have created a tradition which they use to help the lessons and stories of the Torah come to life [http://shamash.org/jfl/article/myfamtorah.html]. Their "family Torah" consists of scrolls in which they record their discussions. On Shabbat: What do you think the world's first Shabbat was like? What do you remember about your first Shabbat? On sibling rivalry: Study the relationship between Cain and Abel. Discuss the meaning of sibling rivalry, its causes and consequences as they apply to each family member (including the parents' siblings).

Simchat Torah doesn't boast identifiable foods like hamantaschen or latkes. But that hasn't stopped Joni Schokett in her Simchat Torah Recipes for Children [http://shamash.org/jfl/article/strecipeschild.html]. How about Carrot, Raisin, Pineapple and Almond Salad or Best-Ever Chicken Fingers?

Gil Marks has ideas some for an older crowd [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=1101].

And the Union of American Hebrew Congregations has a recipe for a Torah Challah. This challah should be baked in the shape of the Hebrew letters lamed and bet [http://uahc.org/educate/parent/0203.html]. Why?

The site repeats this beautiful midrash. The last word of the Torah is Yisrael.The first word of the book of Genesis is Bereshit. If you take the final letter of Yisrael, the lamed, and the first letter of Bereshit, the bet, and put them together it spells lev in Hebrew. The meaning of lev is heart. The midrash tells us that the Torah is the lev – the heart – of the Jewish people.

Rabbinic Reflections

Endings and beginnings

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

Some things have meaning far beyond what we can immediately see. Some stories give meaning to things that we often do not see.

In his book, Jerusalem, author Amos Elon shares an observation with the reader. He wonders why is it that the holy city Jerusalem is called a "she?" More so, why is it that the earth, sky, sea and mountains are all referred to in the feminine gender?

Possibly when things are beyond comprehension in their depth and beauty, we liken them to a gender whose beauty and depth surpass our comprehension.

There is indeed a mysterious connection that men see in women. I believe it begins with the initial story of creation, of woman being drawn from man. Yet, from that moment, any similarity ended, and woman evolved into something far beyond and different to what man was (and is).

This weekend, we will celebrate the completion of the yearly cycle of readings in our Torah. Endings are unique opportunities because they can define what direction we will choose for our futures.

Yom Kippur ended a few days ago. The Shulchan Aruch (Code of Jewish Law) tells us of the custom that some had to observe a second day of fasting!

It also tells us in the same breath that when the fast ends, the meal we eat should be celebratory. Indeed, the midrash speaks of a divine proclamation which says, "Go and eat with joy!"

No matter what way we choose to end Yom Kippur, both ways have a blessing associated with them.

But when it comes to Torah, the only choice worthy of blessing is one of continuity. So we begin the reading of the Torah again on the same morning that we finish the cycle.

The given title of the people who are called for an aliyah to both end and begin the cycle is chatan (groom).

In some small, but very deep way, we, too, approach the Torah with a sense of awe and wonder. No matter how many times we have heard it read, no matter how many times we have witnessed the end and finish to the Torah, it should never fail to touch us, because our Torah contains a mysterious and feminine mystical element that we are so drawn to. And forever will be.

Chag Samayach!

Summer camp experience

Guest Voices

By SHARON RAPOPORT

I would like to add to the continuing discussion expressed in earlier columns of the importance of the summer camp experience.

I attended Camp Kvutza, a Labor Zionist camp near Dunnsville, Ont., in the years between 1955 and 1959. Some of the people I became friendly with went on to become staff members as well.

More than 40 years later, the connections we made as campers in the '50s still remain. We have gatherings ranging from "power breakfast," mostly luncheons, at least three times a year. The participants may vary slightly, but all members of this group make a concerted effort to attend these events.

Others who sometimes join the group comment that the many simultaneous conversations amuse and energize them. They will often request an invitation.

As Bruce Elman said in his column (Aug. 19) in response to Jennifer Fox's column (July 29), I too believe that the names and identities of the counsellors we had, made an enormous impression on our experiences.

As a researcher today, completing a doctoral dissertation on the supporting role of attachment figures and the family home for school-aged children of divorced parents, I feel that the camp counsellor has an important caregiving function, and therefore has a pivotal role in the child's life.

When children attend camp for four or eight weeks, they look to their counsellors to fulfil the role of their parents.

Erica Horn said it is school that "prepares kids for the future and trains them to handle the world." I believe that camp also holds this preparatory function.

In her column (July 29), Horn construed camp as "part of fantasy life." I disagree. To me the routines of camp life – swimming lessons, arts and crafts, hikes, singsongs, and special events such as color war and the celebration of Tisha b'Av – are extraordinary preparation for the rest of one's life.

Routine activities were halted when Shabbat arrived. We greeted the Shabbat Queen in the apple orchard as part of services that were followed by the Shabbat dinner in the dining hall. Everyone was dressed in their finest whites. Friday night folkdancing followed.

Saturday morning sleep-ins and services, unstructured afternoon baseball games – these activities rounded out the special day. In my opinion, it was a great preparation for important lifelong relationships.

As Horn mentioned, "the bonds of friendship formed throughout camp are unbreakable."

Those friends that withstand the test of time – my "friends of the heart" – and I often talk about our memories of counsellors Florence Keltz and Sheila Fine, who were substitute parents for us, those many years ago. One of the many things they taught us was how to be parents to our children.

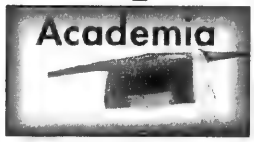
York University professor has special interest in refugees



By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Howard Adelman is still haunted by that horrific sight he witnessed in 1996.

There, before his unbelieving eyes, lay thousands of corpses. They had just been dug up from a mass grave in the backyard of a technical school in southwestern Rwanda.

They were rotting under a broiling sun, the hapless victims of a tribal struggle in the heart of Africa which had triggered a mass movement of refugees.
